It means $100 million we possibly could spend on Head Start Programs, $100 million we could possibly spend on community health clinics, $100 million that might go for the Job Corps.

We have won a victory and most of all I think it is important that we postpone that process which many unfortunately want to start which will probably escalate us into a war in Central America which might end with the deaths of large numbers of American boys.

It was clearly a victory yesterday.

THE ANTITERRORIST ACT OF 1986

(Mr. BARTON of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, today I, Congressmen DUNCAN HUNTER, and BOB LIVINGSTON, together are introducing in the House of Representatives the Antiterrorist Act of 1986. Senator DOLE and Senator DENTON are introducing identical legislation in the other body. This legislation is one part of a long-term strategy to deal with terrorism.

As signaled earlier this week, our President has decided to fight back against terrorists, and we need to give him the explicit authority to do so.

There is some question that under the existing War Powers Act our President may have to consult with Congress before he initiates any counterterrorism activities. Doing so may make it much more difficult to fight back against terrorism.

Our act does two things specifically. It redefines terrorism as an act of aggression against the United States of America, its citizens, and American corporations. Number two, it explicitly excludes antiterrorism activities from the jurisdiction of the War Powers Act.

Terrorists do not have to conduct committee meetings before they decide to strike; we should not require our President to do so either, as he attempts to fight back.

Every American citizen is a potential victim of terrorism. Let us give our President the authority to effectively fight back and prevent, if possible, any more Americans from becoming actual victims of terrorism.

IN SUPPORT OF H.R. 281

(Mr. SIKORSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SIKORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of H.R. 281, the so-called double-breasting legislation and in opposition to weakening amendments.

The opponents of H.R. 281 are using some unpoetic poetic license in their debate, and I would like to take this opportunity to set the record straight.

H.R. 281 does not expand labor law into new areas. It does not deny workers freedom of choice. It is not a power-grabbing attempt by unions to give them undue influence in the industry marketplace. Its only purpose is to define already existing provisions of labor law that deal with prehire agreements which have been subverted by antiworker members of the current National Labor Relations Board.

H.R. 281 is needed to end these abuses and to restore to labor relations the original intent of Congress when it passed the Landrum-Griffin Act in 1959.

THE FBI: FIDELITY, BRAVERY, AND INTEGRITY

(Mr. OXLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. OXLEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to express my deep sorrow to the families of the two FBI agents, Benjamin P. Grogan and Jerry Dove, who were killed in a bloody gun battle in Miami on April 11. In the same incident, five agents were wounded during an attempted arrest of suspected bank robbers. This is a great and tragic loss to the Bureau and to the entire law enforcement community.

These agents were performing routine surveillance when they spotted a stolen car with a license plate matching one suspected of being used in recent Miami-area holdups. Special Agent Joseph V. Corless, a former colleague and supervisor of the bank robbery squad when I was an agent in New York, stated that the agents radioed for backup and, when they had sufficient assistance, attempted to pull the car over. It was at that point that the agents were fired upon by machineguns from the suspects' vehicle.

These agents were professionals. They followed the proper procedures and reacted wisely and competently. They knew the risks, but they unfortunately lost their lives in the performance of their duty. As a former FBI special agent, I also am aware of the dangers involved in the line of duty, the risks that agents take everyday, and the selfless behavior they display when confronted with a life-or-death situation. While it is difficult to express the proper sentiments in a 1-minute statement, I again offer my condolences to the families of the two slain FBI agents and commend their bravery and that of their wounded colleagues.

Fidelity, bravery, integrity, that is what the FBI is all about.

LAFAYETTE, WHERE ARE YOU?

(Mr. SCHUMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, in 1917, Gen. Blackjack Pershing arrived on the shores of France and told a war-torn Europe, "Lafayette, we are here."

Today America asks, "Lafayette, where are you?"

The American people are perplexed and vexed to see pictures nightly on their TV screens of Europeans demonstrating against the American action in Libya. Congress is concerned and confused when the foreign ministers of France and Germany and Italy condemn American actions, but give us no alternative in its place. After all, Kenneth Ford, the brave sergeant killed by Libyan terrorism a week ago, was not just defending American interests, he was defending European interests as well. And our European allies have told us we ought to resort to diplomacy.

It is their failure to join us in economic sanctions and in evicting the Libyan embassies from the face of Europe that forced upon America this action, the least desirable, but only available alternative.

To our European allies I say, we are ashamed of you. You should, at the very least, be quiet and, in fact, be doing more than that by backing up our action. Until you have a better way, please be silent.

In 1917, "Lafayette, we are here;" in 1986, "Lafayette, where are you?"

LIBYA-NICARAGUA CONNECTION IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mr. BILIRAKIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with this House, Mr. Speaker, a news item on television this morning. Film reports from Managua showed Libyan soldiers marching in solidarity with their Nicaraguan counterparts and denouncing the United States.

I think it is important to note that this is the very first time that the presence of Libyan troops has been openly displayed by the Sandinista government.

This should be a lesson to those critics who misplace their naive faith in the empty words of good will from the Sandinistas. In this case, Mr. Speaker, actions speak much louder than words.

I find it hard to believe that these Libyan troops are emissaries of peace or are there to encourage the Contadora process. However, perhaps they are there to share their expertise in agriculture and irrigation with the agrarian reformers in Managua.

After all, the green revolution in Libya has made private ownership of land illegal, and the Sandinistas have demonstrated that they are eager to follow this same path.

I point this incident out, Mr. Speaker, even as we in this House continue to debate the true intentions of the Nicaraguan Government in Central America. As Managua echoes with the boots of Libya—a nation engaged in active terrorist warfare against the United States—let us fix in our minds the picture of those soldiers marching. Can a Libya-Nicaragua connection be the hope for the future of Central America? The hope for our hemisphere?

I say no, Mr. Speaker, and I say the best way to stop such a connection is to grant the freedom fighters the wherewithal to oppose this disturbing alliance. Thank you.

REPUBLICANS DUCK CONTRA VOTE

(Mr. FRANK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, history gets rewritten very promptly these days. We are being told that the reason the Republican Members of the House voted for the Hamilton substitute yesterday was because of their sense of outrage at a procedure which would have tied one piece of legislation to another. That is the least plausible explanation I have heard for anything in a long time.

They did that yesterday for one simple reason. They were going to lose on the McCurdy amendment. The American people will not support the President's right to wage war by proxy in an unlimited way down there. So they knocked over the table because they did not like the way the cards were being dealt.

Before anyone believes that they were upset at the notion of tying one thing to something not fully related, remember that this is the party which gave us this year with their overwhelming vote a new subsidy for tobacco farmers as part of the reconciliation bill. These are the people who gave us the Gramm-Rudman mistake as part of a bill to extend the debt limit. These are the people, many of them who were here then, who voted for Gramm-Latta, which took a whole range of unrelated things and made them into one very inconsistent whole. There has not been a time since I have been here that the Republican Party has objected to the tactic of tying one thing to another.

They were going to lose the vote yesterday, so they kicked over the table, and now they are pretending to be procedurally outraged. They are a very unlikely set of candidates for that particular vestment.

GREAT BRITAIN DESERVES OUR ENDURING GRATITUDE

(Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Missouri [Mr. SKELTON] and I have introduced a resolution today putting Congress on record as giving its highest praise and thanks to Great Britain and Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher for aiding the United States against Libyan terrorism.

When the time came to confront ruthless terrorists, Britain stood with us. No other ally wears that badge of courage.

Mrs. Thatcher took enormous personal political risks to do what was right. By taking a stand in support of free people everywhere, Mrs. Thatcher risked criticism from political opponents. She chose a courageous moral path rather than political expediency. Her actions will fortify and inspire us to continue our fight against terrorism.

The United States and the United Kingdom have long been allied in the great World Wars against tyranny and are joined in the North Atlantic alliance to deter aggression.

A loyal ally understands that countries have interests beyond their own borders, and our British friends recognize this. And for that, they have America's enduring gratitude.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all my colleagues to join us in cosponsoring this very important resolution.

AMERICA NEEDS A SENSIBLE OIL IMPORT POLICY

(Mr. TAUZIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TAUZIN. Mr. Speaker, following the United States air strikes against Libya, Colonel Qadhafi sent his minister to the OPEC meeting in Geneva demanding an oil embargo against the United States of America.

It is, of course, history now that the Geneva meeting denied and, in fact, ignored that request We should not be surprised by that.

The fact is that the United States is only about 10-percent dependent upon OPEC oil today. We should, however, be reminded that in the late 1970's, when we were approximately 30-percent dependent upon OPEC oil, a similar request for a U.S. oil embargo was not only heeded, but adopted, with awful effects on this economy.

Now my father when I was very young gave me a good piece of advice. He assured me that through my life I would make a number of mistakes, but he cautioned me not to make the same mistake more than once. We in America ought to consider my father's good advice as we approach the end of this decade. Should we allow ourselves to become so dependent upon OPEC oil that the next request by the minister from Libya for an oil embargo against the United States would not only go unignored, but in fact heeded, and the United States might find itself in that same awful position

It is time now, America, to wake up, to guard against that type of dependence on foreign oil. It is time now to adopt a sensible oil import policy for America.

ELDERLY VETERANS CARE ACT OF 1986

(Mr. RIDGE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, ensuring adequate health care for our elderly veterans is fast becoming one of the most critical issues of the decade. With the average age of the veteran population steadily rising, steps must be taken now to prepare the VA health care delivery system for the increasing demand for services. Consequently, I am introducing the Elderly Veterans Care Act of 1986.

This legislation provides a tax credit to the families of elderly veterans who need home-based health care. The credit covers such expenses as home health aids, adult day care, respite care, nursing care, and medical or health-related equipment and supplies.

Credit amounts will be determined by a sliding scale based on annual income, similar to the dependent care tax adopted by Congress in the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981. Families with $10,000 or less in income will receive a credit for 30 percent of the home health care expenses they incur, up to a maximum credit of $1,050. Low-income families who do not pay enough taxes will have any unusable credit refunded directly to them. The maximum amount of credit would be gradually reduced based on income over $10,000, with families having $50,000 or more in adjusted gross income ineligible for credit. Consequently, the most needy families receive the greatest relief.

This legislation is important because it represents a practical solution to the VA health care problem without forsaking our longstanding commitment to the men and women who have served this country. This measure promotes a compassionate alternative to institutionalized medical services by providing for care in the most natural environment—the veteran's own home. Moreover, by granting the tax credit directly to the family, the proposal recognizes the temendous sacrifices they make as the primary caregiver to elderly veterans. It also recognizes the need for Congress to relieve the continuing financial pressure on the health care delivery system of Medicare and Medicaid.

The Veterans' Administration predicts that there will be more than 7 million veterans over the age of 65 by 1990. The VA itself has recommended the creative development of program initiatives to help meet the healthcare needs of our maturing veteran population. My bill meets this challenge by providing more flexible care for veterans, while making more hospital beds available for critically ill patients.

Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to introduce this important legislation, and I invite my colleagues to join in support of the Elderly Veterans Care Act.

CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY LABOR LAW AMENDMENTS OF 1985

(Mr. ACKERMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, the right of employees to form and join labor organizations and to bargain collectively is a fundamental tenet of democratic society. Most of us rightly pointed to Poland's denial of workers' rights to form their own organizations, as an indication of the repressive and undemocratic nature of that government. That is why so many of us took hope in the solidarity labor movement.

In the United States, the National Labor Relations Board is charged with protecting the right of workers to engage in collective bargaining, usually by a representative election.

Because of the short-term nature of construction work, a different procedure was spelled out by the National Labor Relations Act, allowing prehire agreements in the industry. However, employers after signing prehire agreements are simply voiding them at will. Rulings by the NLRB and Federal courts have sanctioned a practice which, in essence, has denied employees the right to representation. We must restore to construction workers their basic rights under our Nation's labor laws. That would be done by H.R. 281, which we have before us today.

Either we believe in collective bargaining and employees' rights to union representation, or we don't. If we do believe in these principles, we need to do something about current practices in the construction industry which undermine free collective bargaining.

I, therefore, urge my colleagues to support H.R. 281, before we leave here this afternoon.

VICTIMS OF TERRORISTS

(Mrs. HOLT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, when a terrorist planted a bomb aboard a TWA airliner on a flight to Greece, the incident had a special impact on my district because three of the victims were members of my community. They were a mother, Demetra Stylian, 52; her daughter, Maria Klug, 24; and granddaughter, Demetra Kristina Klug, 8 months old.

As you know, the explosion blasted a hole in the side of the aircraft and the victims were blown out and fell to earth near the small Greek village of Argos, where their bodies were found by shepherds.

From this vile crime that showed a total disregard for humanity and international law has come a beautiful gesture of love and caring. Warren Klug, Jr., the husband of Maria and the father or the infant, Demetra Kristina, was so moved by the poverty and pitiful condition of the children of Argos that he established the Argos Fund, the name of the town upon which his loved ones fell from the heavens.

He said:

My daughter's life ended before it started and we wanted to direct your expressions of sympathy to the fund for needy children.

Mr. Klug also said that:

We recognize that our personal tragedy is also an American tragedy. We are grateful that more people were not hurt by this crime, and our love and prayers are with the family of Mr. Ospino (the fourth victim). We are weakened by the loss of our loved ones, but we remain strong in our belief in God and our country.

Andreas Stylian my father-in-law, emigrated to America, as so many before him, to build a better life for his family. He was proud that he and his family were Americans, and now our family has been murdered because they were American.

To those responsible for this cowardly act, you have succeeded in devastating our family, but you will never destroy the heart and spirit of America. We anxiously await your judgment day before Americans who are not defenseless and, more importantly, before God.

I pay tribute to this generous move.

AN ISSUE OF INTERNATIONAL SIGNIFICANCE

(Mr. LUNGREN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, for anyone who is uncertain as to who the winners and who the losers were yesterday, one only has to listen to some of the 1-minute speeches. Those who are protesting what happened yesterday seem to come all from one side of the aisle. That may suggest who won and who lost.

But beyond that, Mr. Speaker, I would say I was pained to hear some of the responses of leadership on the other side, to hear the majority leader on television talk about yesterday's action by the Republicans being cynical, to hear Mr. BARNES refer to it as cynicism on our side.

That is not cynicism. Cynicism is a stacked Rules Committee. Cynicism is an unfair rule. Cynicism is not allowing the President of the United States a free shot on his proposal on an issue of international significance. Let us have no more doses of cynicism. Let us have a fair up or down vote, then we will see who has the votes here, without all of this political jockeying.

MARINE SAFETY

(Mr. SMITH of New Jersey asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, later today, two of my constituents, Rosemary and Roderick Hofer of Brielle, NJ, will testify before two House subcommittees on marine safety.

Mr. Speaker, tragedy struck the Hofer family last summer when their youngest son, Christopher, was lost in a fishing boat accident off the coast of Marmot Bay, AK. As the Hofers will tell the subcommittees today, the craft which carried their son lacked basic survival equipment. In fact, it is quite apparent that the 48-foot vessel, a wood vessel, the Western Sea, should never have been allowed to leave port.

Christopher Hofer's loss on board the Western Sea was a tragic but not isolated incident. Coast Guard statistics indicate that an average of 250 fishing boats sank each year from 1981 to 1983. I find it disturbing and shocking that the death rate of fishermen is seven times the national average for all industry groups, and twice that of the next most hazardous profession, mining.

There is no doubt that many of the dangers stem from natural causes such as unpredictable winds and high seas, but it is also very clear to me that an industry that is riddled with natural hazards should be governed by strict safety regulations. Today's hearing, I am sure, will focus attention on this need for reform in this area.

SOCIAL SECURITY—A VESTED FUNDED SYSTEM

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, young people in America have no faith that Social Security will provide adequately for their retirement and unfortunately, they're probably right.

Seniors today are receiving back on average $3 for every $1 they and their employers paid in, and that's wonderful and has largely eliminated senior poverty. But demographics indicate that this will fall back to less than $1 for each dollar by the mid-2030's, although surpluses will occur in the meantime.

I don't want to see Social Security become a welfare program, Mr. Speaker, or have FICA taxes, already a large burden on productive workers and small business, go any higher.

Let's begin thinking now about how we can, over the next 50 years, move to a Social Security System that will be just as good to seniors then as this one is now. A vested, funded system where each worker owns his or her own individual retirement account and invests it and watches it grow is the ideal we should begin to work toward now. It's not too early to start thinking of the future, even one 50 years away.

TRADE UNIONS

(Mr. COBEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COBEY. Mr. Speaker, the proponents of the so-called Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985 claim that the law as it stands inadequately protects the ability of trade-union officials to enforce collective bargaining contracts.

As a solution, they have proposed H.R. 281, which would virtually stamp out freedom of association by construction workers.

Before we discuss the sweeping new organizing powers for trade union officials, we must first consider the special powers enjoyed by these trade unions which no other unions in our society share.

I suggest that the answer to trade unions' problems with declining membership isn't to heap on more compulsory unionism powers.

The solution to their problem is to win the hearts and minds of construction workers by providing decent, professional representation at the bargaining table, rather than squandering the workers' dues on salaries and political schemes.

I urge my colleagues to do all in their power to defeat H.R. 281.

PROVIDING FOR REAPPOINTMENT OF CARLISLE H. HUMELSINE AS CITIZEN REGENT OF BOARD OF REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on House Administration be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 214) to provide for the reappointment of Carlisle H. Humelsine as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FRANK). Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to the distinguished gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] for an explanation of her bill.

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution and the one which follows are reappointment resolutions for citizen regents serving on the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. Mr. Humelsine and Mr. Bowen have filled their appointments, to date, with professionalism, sincerity, and an unquestionable commitment to the Smithsonian Institution. Through my task force, I have dealt with both gentlemen on several occasions. They have always been responsive and helpful to my concerns. The Committee on House Administration's Task Force on Libraries and Memorials, which I chair, has reviewed and favorably recommends these reappointments.

If the gentleman will withdraw his reservation, I will offer a perfecting amendment in the nature of a substitute which will provide for continuity in the service of Mr. Humelsine's appointment. In other words, his term will be unquestionably continuous.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I strongly support Senate Joint Resolution 214 and Senate Joint Resolution 215 and urge their adoption by the House.

These measures would reappoint Carlisle H. Humelsine and William G. Bowen as citizen regents of the Smithsonian Institution. Their current terms expired in March and, as the Board of Regents next meets in May, timely action on these measures is critical. I want to thank the chairwoman of the House Administration Committee's Task Force on Libraries and Memorials, Ms. OAKAR, and the ranking minority member, Mr. GINGRICH for insuring that these measures could be considered on the floor before the next Board meeting.

I have the privilege of serving as a congressional regent on the Smithsonian's Board of Regents. In that capacity I have had an opportunity to work closely with Mr. Humelsine and Dr. Bowen. I want my colleagues to know that through their exceptional abilities and uncommon dedication, they have made innumerable contributions to the work of the Smithsonian Institution. The Institution, and all whose lives it touches, are fortunate that Mr. Humelsine and Dr. Bowen are willing to serve another term as regents. I have no doubt that they will continue to discharge their responsibilities as regents in the exemplary manner which has characterized their past service, and in so doing, further enhance the reputation of the Smithsonian as one of the world's foremost educational institutions. I urge the House to give an overwhelming vote of approval to their reappointments.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, because the minority on the committee is in full support of the gentlewoman's resolution and amendment, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 214

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, which will occur by the expiration of the term of Carlisle H. Humelsine of Virginia on March 13, 1986, be filled by the reappointment of the present incumbent. The appointment is for a term of six years and shall take effect on the day after the current term expires.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MS. OAKAR

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Ms. OAKAR: Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That, in accordance with section 5581 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (20 U.S.C. 43), the vacancy on the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in the class other than Members of Congress, occurring by reason of the expiration of the term of Carlisle H. Humelsine of Virginia, is filled by reappointment of the incumbent for a term of six years, effective March 13, 1986.

Mr. FRENZEL (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

TITLE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MS. OAKAR

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title amendment offered by Ms. OAKAR: Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution providing for reappointment of Carlisle H. Hummelsine as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.".

The title amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR REAPPOINTMENT OF WILLIAM G. BOWEN AS CITIZEN REGENT OF BOARD OF REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on House Administration be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 215) to provide for the reappointment of William G. Bowen as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to the distinguished gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] for an explanation.

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution, along with the previous one, is a reappointment resolution for a citizen regent currently serving on the board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. The Committee on House Administration's Task Force on Libraries and Memorials have reviewed and recommends favorably the reappointment of Mr. Bowen.

If the gentleman will withdraw his reservation, I will offer a perfecting amendment in the nature of a substitute which will provide for continuity in the service of Mr. Bowen's appointment.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, the minority believes that both of these regents are splendid ones, richly deserving reappointment. We support the gentlewoman's requests in all respects.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S. J. Res. 215

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, which will occur by the expiration of the term of William G. Bowen of New Jersey on March 13, 1986, be filled by the reappointment of the present incumbent. The appointment is for a term of six years and shall take effect on the day after the current term expires.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MS. OAKAR

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Ms. OAKAR: Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That, in accordance with section 5581 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (20 U.S.C. 43), the vacancy on the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, in the class other than Members of Congress, occurring by reason of the expiration of the term of William G. Bowen of New Jersey, is filled by reappointment of the incumbent for a term of six years, effective March 13, 1986.

Ms. OAKAR (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, let me just comment on the amendment and the spirit of these appointments, just very briefly, for the benefit of the Members.

Mr. Speaker, I think the Members should know that Mr. Humelsine, in particular, and the Smithsonian Board of Trustees several months ago did decide to divest their holdings in South Africa. I thought that this was a very, very positive step. Besides all of the other reasons mentioned, I hope that we will approve these appointments. But I wanted, for those Members who had concerns about the Smithsonian and its investment practices, to know that they no longer have investments in the international portfolio that relate to South Africa investments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

TITLE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MS. OAKAR

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title amendment offered by Mr. OAKAR: Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution providing for reappointment of William G. Bowen as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.".

The title amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on Senate Joint Resolution 214 and Senate Joint Resolution 215, the Senate joint resolutions just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

COMMEMORATING 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF BAY OF PIGS INVASION

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 599) commemorating the 25th anniversary of the Bay of Pigs invasion to liberate Cuba from Communist tyranny, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but I simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the chairman of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

Mr. GARCIA. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to state that this resolution has been introduced by one of the senior Members of this House, the gentleman from Florida, Senator PEPPER, and another good colleague of ours, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], as well.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, today is the 25th anniversary of the Bay of Pigs invasion, and both the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] have long been involved in this commemorative dealing with the Bay of Pigs, and I would just like to take this opportunity to commend both Congressman PEPPER and Congressman FASCELL on the work that they have done on this resolution.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 599

Whereas April 17, 1986, marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of the first day of the Bay of Pigs attempted liberation of Cuba by the heroic 2506 Brigade, a battle which entailed three days of fighting at a narrow strand of mangrove, bunch grass, coral head, and sand lying thirty miles from the towns of Giron and Playa Larga and bounded by the Bay of Pigs and the Cienaga de Zapata swamp;

Whereas on April 17, 1961, the fourteen hundred gallant and intrepid men who made up the brave 2506 Brigade were ill-equipped but possessing immeasurable spirit, courage, and determination, sought in the tradition of the great liberators Jose Marti and Simon Bolivar to liberate from Communist tyranny the beautiful isle of Cuba and reestablish freedom and democracy for the people of Cuba, that great island lying so close to the United States;

Whereas the patriotic, noble, and sacrificial effort of the 2506 Brigade to liberate Cuba as in the same patriotic spirit that prompted other courageous and intrepid men to liberate the American colonies from a foreign monarch and establish freedom and democracy in America; and

Whereas the people of the United States proudly commend those courageous warriors who fight for the cause of freedom and justice anywhere in the world and the Congress wishes to express the commendation of the American people to the gallant warriors of the 2506 Brigade who made such an historic effort to establish freedom and democracy in Cuba: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That April 17, 1986, be commemorated as the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Bay of Pigs invasion to liberate Cuba from Communist tyranny.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FAIR HOUSING MONTH

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 303) to designate April 1986, as "Fair Housing Month," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but I simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] who is the chief sponsor of House Joint Resolution 561, to designate April 1986 as "Fair Housing Month."

Mr. FISH. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, first I want to express my sincere appreciation and personal thanks to the subcommittee chairman, BOB GARCIA, and the ranking Republican, JIM HANSEN, for their assistance in promptly bringing this legislation to the House floor.

On March 11, I introduced House Joint Resolution 561 to designate this April as "Fair Housing Month." Since that time, 226 Members of this House—Republicans and Democrats alike—have joined as cosponsors of House Joint Resolution 561. This is a clear reflection of a bipartisan commitment to the principles embodied in the Federal fair housing law.

Mr. Speaker, April 1986 marks the 18th anniversary of the enactment of a Federal fair housing law, as title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968. This landmark legislative action symbolized a legal and policy commitment on the part of the Federal Government to the goal of equal opportunity in housing for all Americans. It remains a cornerstone of our civil rights protection in this country.

Title VIII prohibits discrimination in the sale, rental, or financing of housing based upon race, color, religion, national origin, or sex. Since its enactment, the right of free choice in housing has undeniably expanded. However, despite these advances, discriminatory housing practices still remain an unfortunate fact of life for many Americans—racial and ethnic minorities, handicapped persons, and others. The fact is that the goal of equal opportunity in housing choice for all Americans has still yet to be fully realized.

Few can deny the central role housing plays in the quality of life of every American. It is commonly perceived that of all the services, facilities and other amenities a community provides, few matter more to the individual and his or her family than the kind of housing in which he or she lives—and the kind of neighborhood of which that housing is a part. But for some of our citizens, the dual barriers of prejudice and fear have, for too long, obstructed their fair chance to move into better housing.

The Department of Housing and Urban Development, which has the authority and responsibility to accept and investigate title VIII housing discrimination complaints, continues to receive thousands of such complaints each year. Census data tends to indicate that racial concentration in many of our communities is increasing. To the extent that this situation results from racial discrimination, rather than from free choices by members of all races, there is cause for alarm and remedial action.

Recently, Senator MATHIAS and I introduced our version of comprehensive legislation to amend and strengthen title VIII, H.R. 4119; S. 2040. My good friend, HUD Secretary Sam Pierce, is personally dedicated to a stronger and more effective title VIII, and has been an ardent advocate to that end on Capitol Hill. We in Congress are continuing to explore the possibility of obtaining a consensus on a compromise bill that can be enacted this year. I remain hopeful that substantive fair housing legislation can be passed this year.

Again, I am most appreciative of the assistance of my colleagues in this legislative commemoration of the 18th anniversary of the Federal Fair Housing Act. The other body has already passed this resolution as Senate Joint Resolution 303, and I urge my colleagues in the House to take the same favorable action. Dedication to providing equal opportunities for all and to the elimination of racial discrimination runs deep in the American spirit.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of House Joint Resolution 561, to commemorate the 18th anniversary of the enactment of the Federal Fair Housing Act. I commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] for providing this opportunity to proclaim April 1986 as "Fair Housing Month," which comes in the wake of the steady, and praiseworthy advances that have been made in eliminating discriminatory housing practices.

In 1968, when Congress adopted the Federal Fair Housing Act as title VIII of the Civil Rights Act, we could not even begin to understand the multitude of ways in which the housing industry would be transformed so as to provide all Americans equal housing opportunities. When we consider the pervasiveness of housing discrimination in the 1950's and 1960's, it is not difficult to see how far we have come in providing all people, irrespective of their race, color, religion, or national origin, the house of their dreams.

If I may pause for a moment to comment on the admirable work being done in my own district, by the Rockland County Board of Realtors, you will recognize that we have entered an era where there is a high level of attention to ensuring fair housing oportunities for all Americans, regardless of their economic or racial status. I am pleased to say that the Rockland County Human Rights Commission recently commended the Rockland County Board of Realtors for its tireless efforts to fulfull the needs of Let us reinforce that dedication today. each and every client. I know that the other realtors throughout my district in Orange, Westchester, and Sullivan Counties work equally as diligently to uphold the Fair Housing Act to the letter of the law. Indeed, I believe that this award is symbolic of a greater trend in this country to enforce our fair housing laws.

As a cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 561, I am proud to say that we have come a long way in the struggle against discrimination in the housing industry and urge our continued vigilence in building upon this fine work. I feel strongly that we should all join in and support this measure, voicing our thanks to every man and woman who has worked, either as a concerned consumer, a realtor, or civil rights advocate, to make certain that each individual finds himself in the home, or office of his choice. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support House Joint Resolution 561, and to join in all of the events being sponsored in our communities celebrating this designation. By doing so, we will be enthusiastically voicing our continued dedication to ensuring fair housing oportunities for every American.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 303

Whereas the year 1986 marks the eighteenth anniversary of the passage of title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968, commonly referred to as the "Federal Fair Housing Act", declaring a national policy to provide fair housing throughout the United States;

Whereas the Federal Fair Housing Act prohibits discrimination in housing on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin;

Whereas fairness is the foundation of our way of life and reflects the best of our traditional American values;

Whereas invidious discriminatory housing practices undermine the strength and vitality of America and the American people; and

Whereas in this eighteenth year since the passage of the Fair Housing Act, all Americans must work to continue to improve the Fair Housing Act by strengthening enforcement provisions, by extending the protections of the Act to all our citizens, by assuring there are no victims of discriminatory housing practices, and by making the ideal of fair housing a reality: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating April as "Fair Housing Month" and to invite the Governors of the several States, the chief officials of local governments, and the people of the United States to observe the month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the two joint resolutions just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON S. 410, CONSERVATION SERVICE REFORM ACT OF 1985

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 410) to repeal the Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service, and for other purposes, with the House amendments thereto, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, appoints the following conferees: Messrs. DINGELL, MARKEY, RALPH M. HALL, BROYHILL, and MOORHEAD.

There was no objection.

COMMEMORATING BICENTENNIAL OF AUSTRALIA AND HONORING VISIT OF AUSTRALIAN PRIME MINISTER ROBERT HAWKE

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 128) to commemorate the bicentennial of Australia and to honor the April 1986 visit of Australian Prime Minister Robert Hawke to the United States, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I take this time to ask the gentleman from New York to explain this resolution.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to explain it.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution before us offers Members of the House a unique opportunity to pay tribute to one of our staunchest allies, Australia, and to welcome an outstanding man, the Honorable Robert Hawke, the Prime Minister of Australiai who is now visiting the United States.

Australian and American military forces have fought together in defense of freedom in four wars. A mutual defense treaty has closely allied our two nations since 1954, and Australia has resolutely accepted the responsibilities and costs necessary to maintain this alliance.

The United States and Australia are linked with a common history, a common language and cultural background, and a common respect for international law and human rights. We have worked together in seeking to aid developing nations increase their economic growth and to foster the growth of democratic institutions that would ensure the stability of the region.

Both Australia and the United States have recognized the importance in recent years of keeping the doors open to those men, women, and children forced to flee persecution in their homelands and longing to rebuild their lives in freedom. Australia has resettled over 100,000 refugees from Indochina and thousands more who have fled the repression and brutal regimes in Poland and Eastern Europe.

About 15,000 Australians married American servicemen after World War II, and thus guaranteed that United States and Australian ties would grow even closer in the important years following World War II. Australian films, opera stars, and television programs have enjoyed wide audiences in the United States, though I must say that much as I enjoy the Quantas ads, we do intend to win the Americas Cup and bring it home to the New York Yacht Club in the not too distant future. Then Pan Am will be able to run ads on Australian TV inviting the residents of Sydney to come to New York, the Empire State, and the home of the Americas Cup.

But in all seriousness, the close and warm ties that mark United States-Australian relations are remarkable. We are Australia's second largest trading partner, and we now enjoy a 2-to-1 trading advantage with that nation. Recent changes in our agricultural and trading policies have led some Australians to wonder if our policymakers realized the possible adverse impact which these changes could have on our close friend in the South Pacific. I, for one, hope that the visit of Australia's most able and articulate Prime Minister will help to alleviate these problems and to strengthen the close ties between our two great nations.

Mr. Speaker, during our own bicentennial celebration, Australians contributed generously to the many cultural, civic, and educational programs mounted by our Government and private organizations to commemorate that historic event. Australia is now preparing for its own bicentennial celebration, a year-long observation in 1988. I sincerely hope that given the close people-to-people ties of friendship, shared commitment to democratic values, and our joint efforts to secure peace in the world, that our Government and the American people will accept Australia's invitation to participate in their 200 year celebration in a fitting and full manner.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the House to adopt this resolution commemorating the warm and close ties between the people of Australia and the people of the United States.

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I share the assessment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ] both of the Prime Minister and the importance of Australian-American relations.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 128 to honor the visit to the United States this week of the Prime Minister of Australia, the Honorable Robert J.L. Hawke, and to express the sense of the Congress that the United States should join in celebrating the upcoming 1988 bicentennial of the founding of Australia with appropriate activities and ceremonies.

Over the last two centuries, our two pioneer-spirited peoples have developed strong ties of friendship and mutual respect, rooted in common historical experiences, shared democratic ideals, and shared culture.

The United States-Australian relationship began in the 1790's when American ships first began to dock at the port in Sydney and bilateral trade was initiated. Those ties continued to grow and flourish in the following years. At the time the Australian Constitution was being drafted, our American Constitution and Federal system of government was a model on which Australian leaders of the time drew. In the past half century our relations were cemented in the shared experiences of World War II, the Korean war, and the Vietnam conflict. As partners today in the ANZUS alliance, we continue to pledge our common commitment to the protection and preservation of our shared democratic freedoms.

In the face of such strong and abiding ties the wide expanse of the blue Pacific has proven no barrier.

As we approach the 1988 Australian bicentennial, the President has noted the appropriateness of United States participation in the celebration and has expressed his hope that that can be done in essentially people-to-people ways.

On the occasion of the visit this week to the United States of Prime Minister Hawke, it is fitting for us to extend a warm personal welcome and to reflect on our relations with the people of Australia. As the 1988 bicentennial draws nearer, all Americans join in congratulating our Australian friends on 200 years of magnificent accomplishment.

I urge my colleagues to lend Senate Concurrent Resolution 128 their unanimous support.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate concurrent resolution, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 128

Whereas the United States and Australia enjoy a special and close relationship based on our shared history, cultural heritage, similar political values, and mutual respect for individual liberties;

Whereas our two nations enjoy thriving trade and business relationships and a broad range of people-to-people programs;

Whereas that close relationship has assured an alliance between our two nations in defense of freedom during four wars;

Whereas Australia and the United States are linked in a mutual defense treaty and readily accept the costs involved in preserving international peace;

Whereas Australia participated in the celebration of the bicentennial anniversary of American independence in 1976;

Whereas the Prime Minister of Australia, the Honorable Robert J.L. Hawke, will be visiting the United States in April 1986;

Whereas the Government and people of Australia have invited the Government and people of the United States to join in celebrating the forthcoming 1988 bicentennial of Australia; and

Whereas it is most fitting that this historic event be recognized in a manner which will commemorate Australian-American friendship and strengthen the many ties which link our two great nations together: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress declares its deep and abiding respect and friendship for the people of Australia and salutes Australia in its preparations for the celebration of its bicentennial.

SEC. 2. It is the sense of the Congress that the United States Government should help Australia observe its bicentennial year with appropriate activities and ceremonies that would indicate the high regard and deep affection which the people of the United States hold toward the Government and people of Australia during their celebration.

The Senate concurrent resolution was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate concurrent resolution just adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY LABOR LAW AMENDMENTS OF 1985

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 324 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 324

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of Rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 281) to amend the National Labor Relations Act to increase the stability of collective bargaining in the building and construction industry, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Education and Labor, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule, and each section shall be considered as having been read. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOAKLEY] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TAYLOR], for the purposes of debate only, and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 324 is the rule providing for the consideration of the bill H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 324 is a completely open rule that provides 1 hour of general debate, equally divided between the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Education and Labor. The rule also makes in order one motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985, is a bill that would amend the National Labor Relations Act to increase the stability of collective bargaining in the building and construction industry.

The bill is basically limited to correcting two specific provisions in the National Labor Relations Act. The first provision in the bill would eliminate a practice known as double-breasted contracting. This practice is used by construction industry employers who wish to evade the obligations stated in collective bargaining agreements.

Under a typical arrangement a company which has negotiated an agreement with a construction union would establish a related company which is operated on a nonunion basis. The nonunion affiliate then would base its bids for construction jobs on low, nonunion wage levels and hire employees who would not be entitled to wages and benefits negotiated in the collective bargaining agreement of the original union shop company.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 281 is also intended to eliminate the problems which occur when employers attempt to negate commitments made under section 8(f) of the National Labor Relations Act, which allows construction unions to enter into prehire agreements. Currently, employers can place the burden on the unions to prove that their members favor a prehire agreement. Under this bill a company could only void its prehire agreement after the National Labor Relations Board conducts an election and certifies that a majority of the employees select another union or choose not to be represented by any labor organization at all.

Mr. Speaker, as I stated earlier in my statement, this is an open rule that allows all Members to offer their amendments to provisions of the bill that they may oppose. I urge my colleagues to vote for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 324 brings to the House floor legislation designed to change longstanding labor law and overturn recent Supreme Court decisions upholding the right of the National Labor Relations Board to apply a single employer test.

The rule itself is not so much the problem here today, but the bill it makes in order is highly controversial among thousands of small and mid-sized construction firms in this Nation.

The rule is an open rule and the bill will be open to all germane amendments. The rule does not waive any points of order. It simply provides for 1 hour of general debate and for an open amendment process.

Mr. Speaker, at the very least, I am glad to report that this is an open rule, since the bill will need considerable work on the floor if it is to ever be put into any kind of shape for final passage.

As reported from the Committee on Education and Labor, the bill extends the terms and conditions of a collective-bargaining agreement, a labor union contract, that covers employees of one union shop to the nonunion employees of another shop, if there is direct or indirect ownership of the two unrelated shops.

The bill overrules the National Labor Relations Board doctrine and provides a new congressionally sanctioned test for determining single employer status. This is an attack upon the ability of the National Labor Relations Board and the courts to decide these matters of labor relations policy.

Mr. Speaker, the bill also includes a provision relating to prehire agreements, a provision which imposes by law a collective-bargaining agreement upon individuals who have not chosen such an agreement for themselves.

The prehire agreement provision of this bill also prevents these employees who would be forced to work under an agreement they did not vote upon to remove themselves except through a long and difficult formal proceeding.

Mr. Speaker, there are several substantial amendments to H.R. 281 that will be offered. It is an open rule. I do not believe that there is any controversy over the rule because it is open and provides an opportunity for the House to work its will; however, I do expect several amendments to be offered in order to try to clarify and to clear up some of the controversial provisions of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY].

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the gentleman from Missouri for yielding to me. I suppose it seems a little strange that I would take the well to speak against an open rule. The point is that it is an open rule. It does give us a chance to air out the issue and debate the issue, but my objection to approving this rule is that the rule would allow us to use the time and the resources of this body to give even further consideration to a potential piece of legislation that should not be passed by this House.

H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments Act, is unnecessary legislation. It is unnecessary because the alleged grievances to which it is directed have ample provision to be compensated for or corrected within existing law.

This is a very difficult area I suppose for many of us, but I for one see no reason to extend the law and especially to extend the law where it threatens fundamental rights of individual men and women in America in order to deal with grievances that can be and should be corrected within existing law.

Part of the allegation is that the National Labor Relations Board does not properly enforce existing law. If that were the case, and I have my own doubts regarding that, but if it were the case, then it would seem to me the better alternative would be to go perhaps to a committee like the Government Operations Committee, ask that committee to investigate, bring a report to the House and take action to cause the Federal agency to do its job. After all, that is a consideration that the American people have, a doubt they have, a question they raise. Do the Federal agencies that do now exist and are paid for with their tax dollars perform their functions with diligence and thoroughness, fairness and equity, and if not, perhaps we could better spend the resources of this Nation's Government and this Nation's taxpayers' money seeing to it that they get fair value for their dollar.

The legislation, I fear, is flawed. The language in the legislation is not only ambiguous, but inconsistent. We will be discussing that as we go along.

The legislation is untimely. Not only do I have to ask myself the question, why would this body bring up this kind of legislation that does indeed threaten the basic rights of American men and women, but why now?

You may recall that it was scheduled last December to be on the calendar and was taken off. We wondered when it migth come to the calendar. I, for one, was surprised to find it coming up now.

I got the answer to my question, why now, when I got on the elevator last Tuesday. As I got on the elevator I saw some people joining me on the elevator who were very big in size and all wearing a little button that said, "Vote yes on H.R. 281."

One of my colleagues on the elevator looked at a mountain of a man and told me, "This guy isn't going to like you."

I want to tell you, it is hard to be trapped in the back of an elevator under those circumstances, but it brought it home to me that we put this bill on this calendar at this time because the interested parties, the unions who support and promote the bill, were in town to have their convention and it would be very convenient for them to drop by our elevators and our offices and persuade us to give consideration to their bill.

I understand the purpose of lobbying. I appreciate lobbying, but I really frankly do not think that we should adjust the calendar of the House to the lobbyists' convention schedules, and that is what was done in this case, I have no doubt.

So I am going to ask the Members of this body to vote no on the rule, not because it is a bad rule, but that would be the most efficient way for this body to dispatch with insidious legislation, unnecessary legislation, flawed legislation, and allow us to turn our time to more important things.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the open rule and the rule that is presented by the Rules Committee.

I take special note that the Rules Committee had been asked to provide a modified rule which would have limited the rule or amendments to only those amendments that have been printed in the RECORD. After extending this week, that has gotten perhaps more partisan than we all wish it had, I have to extend my appreciation to the Rules Committee for not adopting that and saying that only under extraordinary circumstances should we require that amendments be printed in the RECORD.

I also take this time to urge a no vote on a bad bill on the underlying bill itself, H.R. 281. It is a bad bill. It is an unfair bill. It is in fact unfair primarily to the workers themselves, both the union workers and the nonunion workers.

I also take a minute to make certain that my colleagues in the House understand that this is not an insignificant piece of legislation. This may well be the most unfair and significant labor law suggestion that has come before this House floor since common situs in the last decade.

It is unfair in a number of ways. First, let me recite what present law does. Under present law, if one employer or one company owns or is affiliated with two or more subsidiaries and if those subsidiaries are clearly separate, that is, they are at arm's length from one another, and one then can be union and one can be an open shop; in fact, others could have other union agreements and they could all operate in the marketplace.

Now, that adapts the law to the present marketplace in which in many geographical areas there is not just one, but two markets; one open shop construction and one union shop construction.

This bill represents a fundamental change, a change of some unfairness and some substantial significance in that it is very straightforward.

This bill would force that company that has two or more subsidiaries to choose between those subsidiaries. If he has a union subsidiary and a non-union subsidiary and an open-shop subsidiary, and if that union subsidiary has a prehire agreement with a union security clause, which most do, then he would be required to cover all his employees within his entire company with the terms and conditions of their union agreement, of which those employees have never had the opportunity to have any input whatsoever, much less a vote.

I will be offering two amendments today which would improve the bill, if adopted. The first would be to redefine the definition of a single employer so as to take substantially out of the committee report, so as to restore present law in that definition, to restore the concept of arm's-length transactions.

Second, an amendment that says that if H.R. 281 passes and if it were to force the employees of an open shop to be covered by the terms and conditions of a union agreement, that cannot happen unless they first have the opportunity for a secret ballot election.

Mr. Speaker, I again commend the Rules Committee for adopting an open rule, a fully open rule and giving the House the opportunity to work its way fully. I urge my colleagues to vote no on final passage, and I think more importantly to consider each amendment on its own merits and consider those amendments as ways to improve a bad piece of legislation.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes, for purposes of debate only, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY].

Mr. CLAY. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support the rule we have before us which would allow for consideration of H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments. The rule is an open one, with 1 hour of general debate.

H.R. 281 is intended to restore fairness and stability to labor relations in the construction industy. It is needed because of the rapid spread of double-breasting throughout the construction industy. Double-breasting has stacked the deck against construction workers and their unions when it comes to collective bargaining.

The Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations first began to study this problem more than 3 years ago. In March 1983, we held the first hearing on this important subject. In September 1983, a subsequent hearing was held. H.R. 281 was introduced at the beginning of this Congress. A hearing on the bill was held again last May. The bill cleared the subcommittee and full committee last summer. We have given all sides every opportunity to participate in the consideration of this bill. We have heard from experts on labor law in the construction industry, as well as from advocates on all sides of the issue. The process has been a fair one and a deliberative one.

Today, we are seeking a fully open rule so that again all sides will have a fair chance. Even those who might have problems with the bill, and I certainly hope there are not many, should vote for this rule, because the process of consideration has and continues to be open and fair I urge your support for the rule.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA].

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank the ranking member on the Committee on Rules for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I want to rise as the ranking member of the Labor-Management Relations Subcommittee in support of the rule. I think it is an eminently fair rule. As this body knows, I oppose the bill and will be prepared to speak against that bill today, but I do want this issue to have a full and complete airing.

If amendments cannot be passed to improve the bill, I shall unalterably oppose it, thinking that it would be better to go back to committee for a compromise. But this rule is fair and I think the committee should have an open hearing on the bill today, so I urge a "yes" vote.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 379, nays 38, not voting 16, as follows:

Mr. COBLE changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. McEWEN and Mr. DORNAN of California changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 324 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 281.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 281), to amend the National Labor Relations Act to increase the stability of collective bargaining in the building and construction industry, with Mr. BONIOR of Michigan in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY].

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Workers in the construction industry are being subjected to harsh and unfair treatment as the result of a recent turn of events in labor-management relations. Twenty-five years ago, the Congress enacted legislation promising them a fair opportunity to collective bargaining if that was their choice. What we see today is an ever increasing recital of broken promises. A fair chance at organizing for the purpose of protecting their job interests, does not exist. Agreements, which are voluntarily entered into by contractors, are routinely ignored. When workers turn to the Labor Board or the courts for relief, the problems are further exacerbated.

This bill before us today merely states that construction workers deserve the same protection under the law as other workers. It says that when a contractor and a union arrive at an agreement both sides are bound by the terms of that agreement. Congress thought it had resolved this problem in 1959 by enacting section 8(f) of the National Labor Relations Act which authorizes prehire agreements. This provision recognized the special characteristics of the construction industry and accommodated the longstanding practices of the industry. What we did in 1959 was sound policy that unfortunately has been undermined by decisions of the Labor Board and the courts. They have mistakenly overruled the intent of Congress. Enactment of H.R. 281 is necessary to restore to workers in that industry a meaningful right to collective bargaining and the protection of our labor laws.

Specifically, H.R. 281 will restrict "double-breasting" which is a legal loophole that has substantially undermined the right of construction workers to organize and bargain collectively. Decisions of the Labor Board and the courts allow a construction contractor who has signed a union agreement to establish a second operation that differs only from the original in the sense that it is not covered by a union contract. The employer then transfers work from its union company to its nonunion company. This unjust scheme of double-breasting flourishes because of the new interpretation of the law permitting employers to escape contractual obligations to their work force.

The sanctity of the bargaining agreement has been eroded in other ways as well. Section 8(f) authorizes a contractor and union to enter into a prehire agreement. A prehire agreement is one voluntarily reached by an employer and a union prior to the hiring of a full complement of employees. Such a provision is needed because employment in the construction industry is necessarily short term and transitory. In return for access to a pool of skilled employees, a contractor agrees that the work will be performed in accordance with a union contract. Today an employer can literally walk away from an otherwise legally binding contract unless the union can meet the impossible burden of proving majority support at all worksites, regardless of the duration of the projects. The very nature of construction work is one of brief, limited time spans. Three to 6 months is the average for work on a project. It is insane to require union members to vote every 3 months in order to prove they constitute a majority, as the Congress recognized in 1959.

H.R. 281 corrects these abuses by providing that prehire agreements are binding unless there is a vote by workers to decertify the union. It eliminates the use of double-breasting as a means of avoiding the requirements of collective bargaining agreements by making such agreements applicable to all businesses operated by a single employer within a specific geographical area. H.R. 281 seeks only to restore to construction workers the rights which Congress recognized and guaranteed in 1959.

Unique problems in the construction industry have not changed, neither should Congress' commitment to the collective bargaining rights of construction workers. H.R. 281 provides those workers with a fair chance to engage in collective bargaining. It does not force workers to join unions, it does not force contractors to sign prehire agreements, it does not affect State laws where union shop agreements are prohibited. This bill simply requires that parties live up to the commitments previously made in collective bargaining agreements. I urge you to vote for passasge of H.R. 281.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY] has consumed 5 of his 30 minutes.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished ranking member of the committee, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS].

Mr. JEFFORDS. I rise in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I could support this bill if it were limited simply to those provisions concerning prehire agreements with some modifications. However, I cannot support this bill because of its more far-reaching provisions regarding the practice of double-breasting.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is being offered today as a remedy to alleged abuses in the construction industry. Let me read from a factsheet in support of the legislation:

Under "double-breasting", contractors with established collective bargaining agreements establish a second nonunion operation which is indistinguishable from the union shop except that it is not covered by a union contract. The employer then transfers work from its union alter ego to its nonunion half—hence, the term "double-breasted" contractor.

Mr. Chairman, such conduct is indeed an outrage and should most definitely be prohibited. The truth is that it already is. To prove this, I submit for the record the citations of 30 such cases where the National Labor Relations Board found a violation.

Let's take a look at the current law. Where double-breasting occurs, the NLRB currently finds an unfair labor practice if either of two situations exists.

First, a violation exists where a sham corporation is formed simply to avoid the union contract. The result is an unfair labor practice and the collective bargaining agreement still applies to the new company.

Second, where two viable enterprises exist with common ownership the NLRB examines a variety of factors to see whether the companies form a "single integrated enterprise." If so, the NLRB then determines whether the employees of the companies have a "community of interests"—a determination which is made in collective bargaining in every industry. If the answer to both these inquiries is "yes," the collective bargaining agreement applies to the employees of both companies.

Now let's consider two cases. First the case of Samuel Kosoff & Sons, Inc. Company A operated as a unionized general contractor employing unionized carpenters and subcontracting all other work to unionized firms.

In 1981, when business slowed, company B was formed as an open shop general contracting company by the same three owners along with an employee of company A. The owners of company A openly acknowledged that their purpose in establishing company B was to become more competitive in a market which they had been priced out of.

The operations of company B were maintained separately from those of company A. In addition, instead of being limited to carpentry, company B's employees were utilitymen engaged in whatever work was needed under the contract. Frequently, company B did perform subcontracting work for company A, which was what aroused the interest and concern of company A's unions.

Were company A and company B a single employer? Clearly, under H.R. 281 they would be and indeed the current NLRB—sometimes called the Reagan Board because of its alleged proemployer bias—determined that company B was an alter ego of company A and therefore bound by the agreement with the union. It based its finding upon the intent of the owners of company A to avoid their union contract obligations.

Now let's look at another case—the Central New Mexico Chapter case. Five years after company C—a union shop electrical company—was formed, its three owners formed company D and served in the same capacity as officers, directors and stockholders. However, company C's work was almost exclusively commercial and industrial electrical contracting. Company D was exclusively engaged in residential contracting work, an area which company C had abandoned, finding it impractical to compete with nonunion contractors.

The National Labor Relations Board found that company C and company D did constitute a "single employer" but refused to apply the collective bargaining agreement to both companies because of a lack of a "community of interest" among the employees of the two companies. In reaching this conclusion, the NLRB noted that the labor relations policies of the two companies were based on their entirely different markets—commercial/industrial as opposed to residential.

These decisions demonstrate the need for a case-by-case analysis of each stitution. The issue is not whether the two companies share the same ownership. The issue is whether an employer is simply using a device to evade collective bargaining obligations, with a loss of work for his unionized employees. If the latter is his purpose, the employer should be restricted under the law—and, indeed, he already is. The bill fails to make these distinctions.

I would be remiss if I did not discuss the prehire agreement aspect of the bill which I do generally support. Under current law, the construction industry is the only industry in which an employer can actually sit down with a union and strike a deal before anyone is hired. This is allowed in the construction industry because, in most instances, the employer hires different workers for each job and jobs last only a few weeks or months.

This situation makes a representation election, which can take several months, totally impractical. Moreover, prehire agreements provide the company with predictable labor costs and a source of skilled workers. It is for these practical reasons that the Congress amended the National Labor Relations Act in 1959 to permit prehire agreements in the construction industry.

However, the statute is silent as to whether an employer can sign such an agreement and then turn right around and ignore it. Fifteen years ago, the NLRB held that an employer can repudiate a prehire agreement at any time up until the union has the support of a majority of the workers. The Supreme Court upheld this interpretation in the Higdon case in 1978.

Obviously, the turning point under these cases is whether "majority status" has been achieved. This is dependent upon a variety of factors and a number of presumptions. Suffice it to say that, with most construction contractors, majority status is achieved very quickly.

However, there are some employers who are only bound on a project-by-project basis, depending upon whether majority status exists on each project. A prehire agreement almost always requires hiring through the union hiring hall. But an employer could avoid the agreement by simply hiring nonunion workers, and never have to worry about majority status being established at a particular site.

I believe that the law should ensure that parties are bound to their agreements. Given the rather limited number of situations where they are not, I fail to understand the hyperbole and controversy which has been generated over this issue. If that were all that were in this bill, it would certainly enjoy my support.

Let me emphasize that my opposition to this bill does not reflect a lack of support for union construction. Indeed, only this week, the Construction Labor Research Council predicted the development of a new stability in the market share between the open shop and the union shop companies. Union shop companies are becoming more competitive through stronger cooperation with their unions. Right here in the Washington, DC area, local union members are enjoying full employment as a result of this cooperative spirit.

This rebound occured in the District of Columbia without the help of this bill. And I believe it can happen elsewhere as well. Union shop construction does not need artificial devices like the "single employer" provisions of this bill to achieve what is already being achieved under current law. I urge defeat of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS] has consumed 10 minutes.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNDINE].

Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Chairman, I am here today to express my strong support for H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985.

Congress passed the National Labor Relations Act in 1935 to protect the right of employees to bargain collectively. The act was amended in 1959 because Congress believed there was a need to accommodate the unique conditions in the construction industry. Today, we are debating H.R. 281, in order to restore the original intent of Congress when it enacted section 8(f) of the National Labor Relations Act [NLRA] in 1959.

As you know, the construction industry is characterized by a work force constantly in flux, changing from employer to employer and geographic area to geographic area, depending upon where work opportunities present themselves. Employment is often seasonal and intermittent.

Because the employment relationship in construction is transitory, representation elections are inappropriate if not impossible. Moreover contractors need to know labor costs when submitting a bid for a project—even though they may not have any employees at the time.

To address the unique characteristics of the construction industry, section 8(f) of the National Labor Relations Act allows contractors and unions to enter into prehire agreements before the contractor has hired a full complement of workers. These agreements generally provide that a contractor will hire its work force through a union hiring hall and pay agreed upon wages and benefits, while the union guarantees that the employer will have access to skilled workers when needed. Neither the contractor nor the union is obligated to sign such as agreement. Once a project is underway, the workers have the right to decertify a union by a simple majority.

Unfortunately, prehire agreements have been eroded substantially by the National Labor Relations Board and the courts, Today, under the Board's view of prehire agreements, an employer is, in many circumstances, free to repudiate a prehire agreement of any duration and the union is powerless to enforce the agreement unless it can prove that, at some previous time, it had established majority support among a stable complement of the employer's workers.

In addition, the NLRB has allowed employers to avoid these obligations by permitting them to establish double-breasted operations. A double-breated company is one which has two separate corporate identities—one will operate under a unon agreement, the other will be an open shop. Both companies will be owned, controlled, and/or managed by the same interests and the decision as to which company will bid on a project will be determined by whether the project will be union or not. A contractor who has signed a prehire agreement simply establishes a second operation to perform the same work under essentially the same management and control as the original operation.

H.R. 281 has a narrow and specific focus and is intended only to require contractors to live up to their agreements. To curtail the practice of double breasting, two or more related business entities in the construction industry under common control and performing the same or similar work would be considered a single employer for purposes of labor law. In addition a labor agreement entered into by such an employer would cover all operations of the employer within the geographic area specified in the agreement.

The legislation also would require that prehire agreements in the construction industry have the same binding effect as other collective-bargaining agreements. They would be enforceable for the period specified in the agreement and could be repudicated only if the affected workers voted to decertify.

In my view, H.R. 281 will restore basic fairness to labor relations in the construction industry and is necessary to reverse the erosion of the rights of construction workers that we have seen in recent years. We should no longer permit the NLRB to deprive workers in this industry of the rights which Congress expressly granted to them and I urge my colleages to join me in support of this important measure.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this bill. I know it is a complicated bill, one that many of my colleagues do not understand because of the complicated technical nature of the vocabulary, as well as the technicalities of the bill, but I will try to explain it as best I can and my reasons for opposition.

Mr. Chairman, first and foremost, these proposed changes to the National Labor Relations Act are totally inconsistent with the act's basic premise—that is, that there will only be union representation when a majority of the employees want it. Second, there are already mechanisms in the law that deal with employers who commit the type of abuses addressed by the bill. And third, in the long run, I believe these proposed changes would actually pressure more contractors to go totally non-union, thus denying them needed flexibility to employ both union and nonunion employees, as well as thwarting employee choice.

The bill address two issues affecting collective bargaining in the construction industry—dual shop operations—double breasting—and prehire agreements. Let me take each of these issues in turn.

Operating dual shops is the practice by some construction contractors who have a contract with a union of setting up a separate company to operate on a nonunion basis for some projects in order to successfully compete with nonunion companies. In the last few years, more and more employers have begun operating on a dual shop basis in response to the competition from nonunion contractors. The problem with H.R. 281 is that it would completely prohibit double breasting—dual shop—whenever an employer has even one small entity that is unionized. It would automatically impose the union upon all of the companies performing the same or similar work in which a contractor has the least bit of common ownership, management, or control. Not only does this all-union requirement completely ignore employee choice—a choice which the statute has guaranteed for 50 years—but it would prevent many contractors from being able to compete in the open market.

Further, we do not need to amend the law in this sweeping manner because there are already legal mechanisms to prevent employer abuses. The National Labor Relations Board, with court approval, has fashioned two legal doctrines which prevent employers who set up separate operations from avoiding the contractual obligations they have with a union. Under the "alter ego" doctrine, an employer is required to apply the collective-bargaining agreement to all its operations if it transferred a substantial portion of its assets, customers, management, and/or employees for the purpose of avoiding its union contract. Under the single employer doctrine, there will be the same result if certain specific factors indicate that different operations are in fact run by a single employer as a single integrated enterprise and that the nonunion employees have interests sufficiently similar to the union employees.

In short, there is already a body of case law which deals with those employers whose purpose in setting up a doublebreasted operation is to shirk their obligations under a union contract. We should not enact amendments which would impose these same rules upon employers whose sole purpose in setting up such an operation is to remain competitive with open shop employers.

There is another important reason why we should not enact a blanket prohibition against dual shop operations. Completely prohibiting these operations will present employers with the choice of operating either all union shop or all open shop. Faced with such a choice, it would only be natural for most employers to go totally nonunion in response to their nonunion competition, because they know that if they sign a contract with a union, their entire business will have to be unionized. Thus, in the long run, these amendments would be harmful to employees' exercise of free choice regarding union representation because it encourages employers to operate completely on a nonunion basis. Again, the basic principle of the statute is violated.

Now I turn to the second important issue the bill addresses—prehire agreements. Prehire agreements are collective bargaining agreements entered into by a union and contractor before any employees have been hired. Although illegal in all other industries, due to the unique nature of the construction industry, such agreements are permitted as a special exception to the statute. But to protect employee free choice, they do not become binding until the union can show that it has the support of a majority of the employees.

The problem with H.R. 281 is that it would make these prehire agreements automatically and immediately enforceable without ever requiring any evidence of majority support. This imposition of union representation on the employees is totally contrary to the rest of the statute.

There is only one provision in the bill which at all takes into account employee choice. Employees could remove union representation or obtain representation by a different union only by petitioning the NLRB for an election—a decertification election. Unfortunately, this would operate more in theory than in reality. Because employees in the construction industry often work for a particular employer for very short time periods—as little as a few days or a few weeks—they are frequently gone before an election can be held. This unique feature of construction industry employment is one of the main reasons why prehire agreements were permitted in that industry in the first place. Thus, practically speaking, decertifying a union is usually an impossibility.

In sum, this bill is seriously flawed. It would enact far too sweeping changes in the National Labor Relations Act—changes which are not only inadvisable for practical reasons, but which reverse the act's basic goal of giving employees the decision whether or not to be represented by a union.

Finally, before closing I would like to mention that I would have preferred to introduce a compromise bill which would tighten up current law where necessary, avoid lengthy proceedings before the NLRB and courts, and adequately deal with the objections I have just mentioned. For example, I believe that the definition of "single employer" in current law could be made more clear to prevent abuse and unnecessary litigation. I believe that there could be an initial period in which an employer must adhere to a prehire agreement in order to allow the union a chance to secure majority support—by majority support I do not mean that an election must be conducted. Mr. JEFFORDS' amendments address the issue of enforcing prehire agreements. And I believe that a way could be found to provide employee choice. However, because of uncompromising positions on both sides and because of the complexity of these issues, I have concluded that the only course of action presently is to defeat this bill and send it back to committee to find a workable compromise that both prevents employer abuses and guarantees employee choice.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BIAGGI] a member of the committee.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time. I want to commend the gentleman for his efforts in this undertaking.

Mr. Chairman, I heard the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS] state that there is no reason for this legislation, and I would be inclined to agree, but only under the supposition that the law that the Congress passed in 1959 still prevailed.

It is amazing how with the passage of time the congressional intent is eroded, the disregard for the clear concern of the Members of Congress at that time, in order to protect the laboring forces of our Nation, the passages of time the courts, as well as the NLRB, have eroded the intent of the Congress, clearly countermanding the impact of the law.

That is why this bill is necessary today. We are familiar with the repudiation of pre-hiring as well as the double-breasting. Those areas are an abrogation on the part of the management, on the part of industry, references made to the stability that exists in the building industry today. We know all of the problems, and we know how it was at another time: instability, labor strife, difficulties, unemployment, management losing money.

Stability came at a price. Congress recognized what was necessary in order to establish and preserve that stability, stability we have today.

But notwithstanding the stability, we are threatened with the spector of a continued effort on the part of industry to emasculate the provisions of law that have protected the interests of the working man.

This bill is necessary in order to reaffirm the congressional intent of 1959 and to maintain a moral commitment that was established in this period.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT], a member of the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me this time. I commend the gentlewoman, the ranking member of the subcommittee, for her statement and her eloquence against this unfair legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a minute to go through some of the terms of the bill to review what is wrong with it, and how it adversely affects the lives of very real people who live in your district and in mine.

First and most basically, the bill, this legislation, would deny freedom of choice to employees to decide whether or not they want to be represented by a union.

Now, reduced to its basics, the bill automatically applies the terms of a union contract to nonunion entities of a dual shop employer. In fact, it could well apply the terms and conditions of a union contract to other union employees of a dual shop employer. The employees of a nonunion entity would be required to pay union dues, abide by union work rules, and could be subject to fines without the opportunity to vote on whether or not they want to be subject to that contract.

If the contract has a union security clause and the employee refuses to pay union dues, the employee could be fired with no means of redress.

Second, and I think it was eloquently stated by the gentlewoman from New Jersey, the bill attempts to resolve a problem that does not exist, a so-called problem that has already been dealt with by present law. The fact is, there is no problem here that needs to be fixed. H.R. 281 would merely outlaw dual shop operations in the construction industry, based on the myth that somehow in dual shop operations, one subsidiary can take the contract of another subsidiary. In case after case after, the NLRB has ruled those operations to be illegal and cannot be operated and, in fact, the law says very, very clearly under the court decisions that dual shop operations have to be at arm's length.

The bill provides a windfall in dues to construction unions, who have been steadily losing market share over the past years. Maybe that is the real reason for this bill. I say that, understanding that what has happened in the marketplace is the marketplace has changed. In 1967, 44 percent of construction workers were unionized; by 1984, that percentage dropped to less than 25 percent.

In fact is we ought to allow the marketplace to set the marketplace conditions. In most markets today in construction, there is not one, but two markets. So, by adopting this legislation, it is not going to change that. It would just simply make many companies noncompetitive and drive many employees of open shops for the short term into a union contract; but for the long term, it would force those same employees to choose between the two markets and many of the employers will choose the open shop market and thus compound the problem of construction unions.

The bill forces construction companies, and the basis of it is, to operate either totally union or totally nonunion without regard to the market, without regard to freedom of choice.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELBY].

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 281, and in support of basic fairness to American workers. I am a free market proponent, and I believe in unfettered competition within the marketplace. It's the engine that drives our economy. If I felt this legislation would somehow inhibit the ability of employers to compete, I could not support it. If I thought the bill would harm the employees it is intended to protect, I would be equally moved to oppose it. The fact is, the bill neither hinders flexibility nor denies freedom of choice. It simply restores equity to employee relations in the construction industry, and brings stability to its rightful place in labor law.

All we are talking about here is fair treatment for employees who have bargained in good faith. We are talking about obligations on both sides to abide by contractural agreements. There is a unique employment situation in the construction industry. Employment is characterized by constantly shifting jobsites—it's transitory. Congress recognized this uniqueness in 1959. Prehire agreements between a union and a contractor may be entered into prior to the hiring of a full complement of employees. This ensures employers access to a supply of skilled workers. Neither the contractor or the union is obligated to sign such an agreement, but once it is done, both sides should remain committed to it.

However, in recent years, many employers, after agreeing to a contract, have simply ignored it. If for some reason, the terms of the agreement were no longer satisfactory, or other problems arose, the employer walks away from the contract. Instead of holding up to this commitment, and working with the union to overcome the problem, a contractor could merely establish a new, nonunion entity to perform the same work. This is what double breasting is all about. And this is the heart of the unfairness we are attempting to address.

Union employees, and all employees, are entitled to an opportunity to preserve their jobs through collectively bargained modifications. This is basic labor law. Unfortunately, administrative-agency rulings have created a double standard in this area. Contracting employers in the construction industry have been given the blessing to evade the obligations of collective-bargaining agreements by establishing double-breasted companies. These employers establish their own rules to fit their convenience and in so doing subvert the will of Congress in fundamental labor law.

Nobody wants to lose his job. No contractor wants to lose access to a skilled work force to complete a project. Union employees, like anyone else, will do what it takes to preserve their livelihood—they only want the chance to do this. They don't want to deny an employer his ability to remain competitive. Everyone loses in that scenario. H.R. 281 is intended solely to ensure that everyone has a fair opportunity to achieve their mutual goals. It's a policy that Congress should be promoting. I urge my colleagues' support for the bill.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3½ minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY].

Mr. ARMEY. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding. I appreciate her courtesy and her consideration and leadership on the committee.

Mr. Chairman, we have a very complex piece of legislation here, and it is particularly important because it deals with what many of us consider to be fundamental human rights.

We cherish in our country the right to freedom of association. It is a rather interesting freedom to be cherished by Americans because a characteristic of the American spirit is a fierce sense of independence and autonomy. Yet even within the context of that fiercest realization that we have been given the right to be our own person by our Lord and Maker, and that right is honored by our Constitution and we cherish that right and will not give it up, we also recognize there are times when associations are important to us.

In labor law this right was honored. I quote from the National Labor Relations Act:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their choosing.

Further quoting:

> They shall also have the right to refrain from any and all such activities.

We have to understand that there are people who would prefer either side of that coin in this country. In recent years, we have seen that that sense of fierce independence and self-autonomy has reflected itself in the choice made by worker after worker in this country, to say, "I choose not to associate, I choose to go it alone, based on my own merits, my own skills, my own abilities, and my own powers to negotiate for myself."

I think this body needs to respect that right to that choice and to do honor by not passing legislation that even would prevent the risk of having that right denied through the imposition of compulsory unionism.

Indeed, Samuel Gompers, a man whom I believe to have been one of the most important leaders of the early labor movement in America, made the point well when he said, "A good union doesn't need compulsion, and a bad union doesn't deserve it."

Now, I do not mean to say that I believe we have here a bad union. We have a very special and difficult circumstance, a peculiar circumstance unique to the industry that makes the juggling of these balls of individuals versus associate liberties and rights on both the side of the employer and the employee and all of the complex issues that we must deal with very difficult because of the nature of the industry.

I will come back to that point later as I offer an amendment to this bill to protect that vital important right of the individual working man and woman in America to be free to not choose to associate.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AuCoin].

Mr. AuCOIN. I thank the chairman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Contract Security Act, introduced by the Honorable William Clay, is a very specific and, I feel, necessary piece of legislation.

Its goals are simple, and just. The bill seeks to curtail the ability of construction employers to evade their union contractual obligations; and it seeks to maintain the construction workers-rights under collective-bargaining agreements unless the work force freely, democratically, under an NLRB sanctioned election, chooses to no longer be represented by a union.

When you think about it, this is a very modest proposal. All it does is require employers in the construction industry to live by the same contract law that employers in every other industry must live by.

The construction industry is fluid and transient. By its very nature, collective-bargaining in the industry is difficult. Lacking a steady relationship with a single employer, the construction worker faces an uncertain future. The next job may come in a few days, or a few weeks. It may require traveling to a distant city.

With a collective-bargaining agreement, much of this uncertainty is eliminated. The wages are consistent, due to the collective-bargaining process. And perhaps more important, the health and pension benefits that American workers deserve and rightfully expect, can be maintained while the worker moves from employer to employer.

Workers in every industry must be free to choose—or to choose not—to be represented by a union. However, having established such a preference, and having the relationship bound in a collective-bargaining agreement, it is only fair to the workers that the labor agreement carry the force of law.

Unfortunately, in the construction industry today, that is often not the case. Signitory construction firms are free to form associate companies, and to use these associate companies to bid on work without regard to the provisions contained in their signed, freely negotiated, collective-bargaining agreement.

I fail to see how this body, steeped in the tradition of American contract law, can sanction such unproper behavior.

I urge passage of H.R. 281 so that American construction workers may share in the same legal protections afforded workers of other industries.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. Oakar].

Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. OAKAR. I yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Mrs. BURTON of California. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask my colleagues to vote for this bill. It is a good bill. The statements that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AuCoin] made are correct. I join him in his statement. I urge all of the Members to vote for H.R. 281.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I want to first of all commend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Clay], and others, for this very important piece of legislation.

It is interesting to me that whenever you talk about fairness, there are usually statements made that will distort the truth. I wanted to just try to clarify a few things that I heard in the debate here that I thought were inaccurate.

First of all, H.R. 281 is necessary to reverse the erosion of construction workers' rights. These are the rights of people who are responsible for building our Nation. And it restores ability to labor relations in the construction industry.

Now, here is one distortion: I heard that it will supposedly force construction companies to be either completely union or completely nonunion. That is a distortion. Nothing in H.R. 281 will force such a choice. Construction firms would still be able to own dual shops if they choose to do so. But if they voluntarily sign a collective-bargaining agreement which requires it to operate a union in a particular area, a firm will not be able to dodge its obligations by setting up subsidiaries or related firms in that area. But they have the responsibility of deciding whether or not they want collective bargaining. So let us not distort that element.

Another distortion I heard was that it would supposedly prohibit a company which has a union contract at just one of its sites from operating nonunion anywhere else ever again.

First, H.R. 281 does not change the current law which says that any company, even a union company, is free to operate nonunion after its collective-bargaining agreement expires; and, second, if the union contract applies by its terms at only a single site, nothing, nothing, nothing in H.R. 281 would extend the contract to or impose the contract on any other site of that employer or any other employer however closely related.

Those are just two of the distortions I heard.

What we are talking about is treating workers fairly in adhering to the law, and this particular bill reinforces existing law no more, no less. So let us not deal with qualified untruths. Let us deal with the truth and say we are talking about fairness and we are talking about not being able to skirt the law, and we hope that we will be able to reverse this erosion of construction workers' rights.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Brooks].

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Chairman, the need for this legislation has been well documented by the committee. In 1959, Congress granted construction industry unions and employers special rights, in order to tailor their collective-bargaining agreements to the unique characteristics of this industry. The National Labor Relations Board, however, has permitted employers, through a series of decisions over the last 10 or 15 years, to avoid those very agreements by the simple device of setting up a second company to do the same work, in the same area, but on a nonunion basis. This practice of contract avoidance by double breasting has become endemic in the construction industry and runs contrary to the most basic notions of good faith and fair dealing which are the cornerstone of our system of doing business.

In addition to being indefensible from a moral standpoint, this practice of double breasting has proven disruptive to the conduct of labor relations in this industry, and therefore runs directly counter to Congress' effort to stabilize labor relations in the industry through the 1959 amendments.

Sections 2(a) and 2(b) of this bill would reverse the erroneous line of NLRB decisions, misapplying the concept of "single employer" and using bargaining unit concepts which Congress recognized 25 years ago do not work in the construction industry.

I do not agree with some opponents of this bill that it would impose collective-bargaining agreements on independent or separate business entities in the construction industry. This bill is aimed specifically at related—and not independent—business entities. Nor is it true that purchasing a single share of stock in a company, or holding a position on the board of directors of a bank which provides construction loans to a company, would satisfiy the definition of single employer in section 2(a) of this bill.

In short, the reasons for supporting this bill are many, and the legitimate reasons for opposing it have yet to be advanced. Rhetorical arguments are not a good substitute for facts or reasoned argument. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting H.R. 281.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985. This bill will restore to the construction industry the treatment that Congress intended to accord that industry through enactment of section 8(f) of the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959.

Decisions of the National Labor Relations Board and the courts have diluted the protections that the 1959 act was supposed to provide in the unique circumstances of the construction industry. These decisions permit employers to avoid bargaining agreements that they have entered into voluntarily and have led to an expansion of the practice of double breasting, in which a union construction company and a nonunion company, both of which are commonly owned and controlled, are established in an effort to avoid collective-bargaining agreements.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 281 would ensure that construction industry collective-bargaining agreements—so-called prehire or 8(f) agreements—would have the binding effect of other collective-bargaining agreements. It would not impose collective-bargaining agreements on independent or separate business entities in that industry. Rather, it is clearly aimed at related business entities.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, H.R. 281 is a reasonable and logical means of clarifying congressional intent as to application of Federal labor statutes to the construction industry. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this measure.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES], a member of the committee.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 281. The bill serves two commendable purposes: To render effective prehire agreements, to resurrect something Congress thought it had accomplished 25 years ago, and to end the dishonest tactic of double breasting as a means of avoiding contractual obligations.

Double breasted operations were relatively unknown until the early 1970's. The beginning of the trend can be traced directly to the NLRB and its 1973 decision in the Peter Kiewit case. That case is discussed in detail in the committee report accompanying H.R. 281 and I will not burden the record by retracing its history. Essentially, however, Kiewit simply shifted the work which was previously performed by employees of its union company to its nonunion company. The nonunion company had become operational in the State for the first time for the specific purpose of avoiding the wages and working conditions required by the collective-bargaining agreement Kiewit had entered.

It is obvious to me that a system that permits an employer to evade its written agreement merely by setting up a new company in order to perform the same work in contravention of that agreement is just plain wrong. That is not what Congress had in mind in 1935 when it sought to promote and encourage the practice of collective bargaining and it is not what Congress had in mind in 1959 when it sought to strengthen and stablize collective bargaining in the construction industry.

Nor is double breasting a practice that is necessary in order for employers to remain competitive. It is vertually impossible to compel an employer in the construction industry to engage in collective bargaining. Even where it is possible, the law requires only that they bargain in good faith; it does not specify the terms or conditions of the contract to be reached or even that there eventually be an agreement. The contracts signed by contractors in the industry are contracts they have freely entered. If they wish to remain nonunion or seek to negotiate a contract covering only a part of their operations they are free to do so. Finally, construction industry unions have as strong commitment and interest in the ability of building construction trade employers to win jobs as the employers do. The ability of the union to provide work for its members is directly dependent upon the ability of contractors who have to recognize the union to win jobs. Where economic conditions render it more difficult for union employers to compete, our national labor policy and the unions' own self-interest require that the employer and the union sit down at the bargaining table to seek a mutually satisfactory solution.

In other words, double bresting is not necessary to the collective bargaining process, it is simply a means of destroying the process. So long as double breasting is permitted, an employer is free to unilaterally walk away from contractual commitments to its workers. Rather than adhering to its contract or negotiating with its workers, the employer simply establishes a second company to do the same work on a nonunion basis. Under such a system an employer may unilaterally determine on a job-by-job basis whether or not workers may enjoy the benefits of collective bargaining. If collective bargaining is to exist only when it is convenient to employers, it will not be long before workers find they have no rights at all. I cannot sanction a system so inherently unjust and I believe that H.R. 281 offers a fair and effective remedy to the problem. I am pleased, therefore, to support H.R. 281.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HENRY], a member of the committee.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the bill for a number of reasons. First of all, I fail to see the problem that has been described. To the extent that the abuses, the violation of the law of contract, do take place against existing law, the remedy should rest then not in new law, but in better enforcement, even-handed enforcement from the NLRB.

Second, the remedy proposed does not really address the problem which has been brought to the attention of this House.

I would suspect in those areas in which the preponderance of construction work takes place in open shops, contractors will simply go to a completely open shop methodology. For those in which most of the work is done in union shops, they will simply go that route.

It is like a little problem I have in my local supermarkets in west Michigan. West Michigan happens to be the apple juice concentrate capital of the Nation. In our supermarkets we are particularly sensitive to see that apple juice gets equal display with orange juice in the frozen fruit section or the fresh fruit section.

Now, what should happen if the orange juice growers coming from Florida should come to this body and ask for a law which suggests that if apple juice is given equal prominence or fair treatment with orange juice, then they will no longer allow the marketing of their goods into those supermarkets, or vice versa.

Well, what would happen is that in west Michigan we would pull out the orange juice and keep the apple juice. Perhaps down in Florida they would keep the orange juice and pull out the apple juice. I am not sure which way it would go, but quite frankly, I think that is what this bill does. It lessens the choice for the contractor. It lessens the choice for the consumer and really in no way gives true remedy to the problem we are seeking to address.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS], a member of the committee.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 281 and urge my colleagues to join me in voting to restore fairness and integrity to construction industry labor law.

Perhaps the best indication of the merit of H.R. 281 is the fact that throughout today's debate, the bill's opponents have steadfastly avoided debating its actual provisions, regaling us instead with a series of ominous and frequently contradictory prophecies that seem to have very little to do with the substance of H.R. 281 itself. From one set of opponents, we hear that this legislation would impose unions on every construction contractor and worker in America; from another set, we hear that the enactment of H.R. 281 would in fact be a deadly blow to unions, setting off an explosion of new, nonunion construction shops. Still farther off the track, others have intoned darkly about inflation and recession, apparently proceeding from the peculiar idea that anything good for workers must somehow be bad for the economy.

All these prophecies have been very interesting, but they have also been completely beside the point.

There is nothing complicated about H.R. 281, nothing that is so terribly hard to understand. It is a simple piece of legislation, designed soley to shut down two glaring loopholes in American labor law. For more than 50 years, the Congress has sought to ensure that negotiations between labor and management in our economy take place on a level playing field, taking great care not to give either side an unfair advantage. Today, however, as a result of a series of ill-founded decisions by the National Labor Relations Board and the Federal courts, that level playing field has all but vanished in the construction industry, supplanted now by a new, much uglier game that is rigged from beginning to end to favor employers.

Across the country, construction workers have discovered to their dismay that the collective bargaining agreements they negotiated in good faith with their employers are no longer worth the paper they are printed on. Though the employees themselves remain bound by the terms of their contracts, their employers have been given free reign by the union-busters at the NLRB to unilaterally terminate bargaining agreements at any time they so desire. To worm out of an existing contract, an unscrupulous construction firm need do nothing more than set up a second, nonunion but otherwise identical firm and proceed to use it to usurp the work of the original union shop. Or, for those too greedy to spend a few dollars to file new incorporation papers, the NLRB has cooked up another recipe for breaking an agreement that is even less trouble: simply ignore the contract and walk away. Both maneuvers, insists the NLRB, are completely within the law, and with both, the results are always the same: once-binding legal commitments are evaded, unions are busted, and workers are tossed out on the street.

H.R. 281 would seal off the loopholes that have permitted these creative, union-busting schemes to proliferate and would restore the level playing field for labor-management relations that Congress has long sought in the construction industry. It would not compel construction firms to recognize unions; it would, however, compel them to fulfill their legal obligations to workers with whom they have signed collective bargaining agreements. It would not rewrite labor law to create any new rights for construction workers; it would, however, require that existing rights already in the law be adequately protected. H.R. 281 merely reestablishes evenhandedness in construction industry labor relations—nothing more and nothing less than that.

It is well understood by most Members of this body that American labor law is in a shambles. Ravaged by time, abused and manipulated by slick union-busting consultants, and maimed by a partisan NLRB, it is in urgent need of a dramatic overhaul. Since it now seems unlikely that we will be taking on that necessary but enormous task anytime soon, it is imperative that we at least move forward with those small, commonsense changes that will go a long way toward making current laws work as they were originally intended. By closing two outrageously unfair loopholes in construction industry labor law, H.R. 281 is one such small, effective change for the better and it deserves the full and enthusiastic support of the Congress.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentlewoman from Nevada [Mrs. VUCANOVICH].

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985.

The question before us today is whether Congress is going to restrict the rights of workers in the construction industry. Because I believe individual workers have the right to choose whether or not to belong to a union, I am opposed to any action by Congress which will eliminate this freedom.

By forcing a construction company that has a unionized subsidiary to operate all of its nonunion operations according to the collective-bargaining agreement with that one subsidiary, the bill will bring all of the contractor's workers under that agreement. The only choice the workers will have at that point is to choose between the union or their job.

Present law provides protection against an employer who attempts to avoid obligations under a union operation to the nonunion operation, the collective-bargaining agreement of the union will be imposed on the nonunion operation. It is unnecessary to change this fair and balanced approach.

In addition, this legislation will effectively eliminate the choice of the owner of a construction business to invest in more than one construction firm. There is no other area of business where citizens are prohibited to invest and conduct business in this manner. Yet another problem with this bill is found in the prehire provisions. Under present law, prehire agreements—which would be illegal in other industries—are not binding on either party in absence of majority status by the union. Once the majority status has been established, the agreement is binding. This allows employees to make their own determination as to whether they will be represented and by whom.

H.R. 281 would make prehire agreements immediately binding. There simply is no reason to elevate a prehire agreement to the status of a formal collective bargaining agreement. This process once again bypasses the workers, forcing them to be bound to an agreement without the opportunity to approve it.

I urge my colleagues to support the rights of the workers and the rights of citizens to conduct business in a fair and reasonable manner. Vote against H.R. 281.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAWKINS], the chairman of the full committee.

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985, and as chairman of the committee, I wish to commend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY] and Members on both sides for the manner in which this legislation was brought before the House. I think they have been very deliberate. I think they have been very fair.

Mr. Chairman, the National Labor Relations Act was originally enacted to ensure that our country's national labor policy not only fairly protected the rights of both employees and employers but also brought stability to an otherwise unstable and threatening labor-management relationship. The essence of why we have a national labor policy, and why it is worth reviewing, is best stated in the declaration of policy, accompanying the 1947 enactment and I quote:

> It is the purpose and policy of this act, in order to promote the full flow of commerce, to prescribe the legitimate rights of both employees and employers in their relations affecting commerce, to provide orderly and peaceful procedures for preventing the interference by either with the legitimate rights of the other, to protect the rights or individual employees in their relations with labor organizations whose activities affect commerce, to define and proscribe practices on the part of labor and management which affect commerce and are inimical to the general welfare, and to protect the rights of the public in connection with labor disputes affecting commerce.

This statement of purpose talks about legitimate rights, orderly and peaceful procedures and reflects a desire for fairness, dependability and straightforwardness in the dealings between employers and employees; this too is what H.R. 281 is all about.

When the National Labor Relations Act was originally passed, however, it was procedurely designed to deal primarily with the process for establishing collective bargaining in industrial fixed site locations. The construction industry by its temporary and mobile nature is quite different than the typical fixed site industrial plant. Over those first years, we found that the act failed to adequately deal with this unique industry. Therefore, cognizant of these real structural differences, and faced with a miserable track record of applicability to the construction industry, and with the very real fear that construction workers would be left without a viable method of establishing union representation, the Congress in 1959, statutorily created and thereby sanctioned what are known as "prehire agreements" in the construction industry. A perhire agreement simply means, in return for access to a stable skilled work force, a contractor will commit to abide by negotiated wages and conditions on specific jobs for a specific period of time. It is the principal means by which construction workers establish and maintain their right to engage in collective bargaining.

No contractor is in any way forced to sign an agreement; it is a voluntary act by the contractor. However, having signed a labor agreement, decency, as well as common sense, argue that the parties abide by their agreement.

Two sets of decisions by the NLRB have worked to undermine the rights construction workers thought they had gained by the 1959 enactment. The first allows unilateral repudiation of prehire agreements, while the other allows the so-called practice of double breasting, the establishment of parallel companies who have common management or ownership but who operate separately so as to negate established collective-bargaining agreements.

These methods of contract avoidance would not be possible in other industries. That is why this legislation, specific to the construction industry, is sorely needed.

In the first line of cases, the NLRB has allowed construction contractors to abrogate their prehire agreements at will, unless the union can demonstrate that the contractor has a stable work force and majority support of that work force. Failing this, the union must demonstrate majority support on every separate job site.

A large contractor may be working on a dozen or more job sites at the same time. He may employ up to a dozen different trades. The different trades may work at different job sites, at different stages of the construction, and at different times. For these reasons, few contractors have "a stable and constant work force," not because of some evil but due to the characters of the industry itself. Just as the unique characteristics of the industry prevent a stable work force, they also, in practice, make the burden of establishing majority support on each job site unreasonable and practically impossible. As an example, a large project may have but a few carpenters employed at the outset. At peak employment, there may be scores of carpenters needed. Later, as the project progresses, the need for carpenters may decline, then increase again as the interior work begins.

I fail to see how, in all fairness, the union in this case could be told they must pursue an NLRB certification election, which can take months and even years. When is the election to take place? When there are a handful of carpenters on the job or at peak employment? I raise these questions only to illustrate, that maybe the real purpose of these decisions is to insure that no election can practically be held—and thus no uniop be recognized in spite of the clear wishes of the workers.

The prehire agreement brings stability to an industry that is highly unstable. Once signed, a labor agreement, as any other contract, must have the force of law. The parties must be able to rely on its binding nature and hence its dependability.

Imagine what would happen if a union had the same right to unilaterally abrogate a labor agreement. No-strike provisions, included in most contracts, would become meaningless. A union would be free to halt work at any time to pursue changes in wages and other conditions. Clearly, this would result in chaos.

The second method of trying to avoid labor contracts in the industry involves double breasting. A company establishes an alter ego, if you will, another construction arm which operates nonunion. Generally, the nonunion breast is in competition with the arm that is a signatory to the collective-bargaining agreement. There is no diminution of the company's role in the industry, only the unilateral termination of its employees rights to union representation.

In effect, these double-breasted firms want to have their cake and eat it too. It is similar to registering to vote as both a Democrat and a Republican so as to vote in both primaries.

Currently, workers are defenseless against this sort of corporate shell game, and when one employer succeeds in undermining wages by such a strategy, competitive pressures force other employers to follow suit.

The intent of Congress 25 years ago was to bring stability and fairness to labor relations in the construction industry. That intent has been frustrated both by the actions of certain members in the industry, and by the rulings of NLRB.

Legislative action is needed to restore the original congressional intent. H.R. 281 is a very simple and direct bill aimed at a very obvious problem. It would restore the enforceability of section 8(f) of the Wagner Act by elevating prehire agreements to the same status as other collective-bargaining agreements. Prehire agreements would be subject to the same provisions as labor agreements in other industries.

In addition, it would eliminate the sham of double breasting.

In sum, H.R. 281 would restore fair and reasonable rights to organize and collective bargain to construction workers.

It is necessary, specific, and well intended piece of legislation. I urge its passage.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a point in concluding this debate that Secretary of Labor Brock has written a letter indicating his strong opposition to the legislation:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
SECRETARY OF LABOR,
Washington, DC, April 14, 1986.

Hon. ROBERT H. MICHEL,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR BOB: This week the House will consider H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1986 (the "double-breasting bill"). The Administration is strongly opposed to this bill, and I urge you to vote no.

We oppose the bill primarily because of its interference with employee free choice and the collective bargaining process. The National Labor Relations Act has established a precise method by which employees can decide their collective bargaining representation. This process contains safeguards for all parties to ensure that neither employers nor employees evade their statutory or contractual obligations under a collective bargaining agreement. This bill would alter this careful process. The bill would also fundamentally alter a central tenet of our labor laws—protecting an individual's right to choose whether one wishes to join a particular union or any union.

The bill consists of two provisions: the first would prevent a contractor from operating both a union and a nonunion operation; the second would broaden the existing pre-hire construction exemption now found in the National Labor Relations Act.

With respect to the first provision under H.R. 281, a union representing the employees of one company would be imposed on the employees of another company who will not have the opportunity to first decide whether they wish to be represented. The employees of this second company would be subject to this decision made by employees of the first company as well as to the decision to accept the work rules, wages and other conditions of employment in the union's collective bargaining agreement.

With respect to the second portion of H.R. 281, a union which has a pre-hire agreement with an employer (setting the terms of employment on a construction site) could become the exclusive bargaining agent of the employees on that site, notwithstanding that a majority of workers may not want to be represented by that union or any union. This means a minority of workers would control the job conditions of a majority of workers.

Proponents of H.R. 281 assert that employers can evade their contractual obligations under a collective bargaining agreement by shifting work to a non-unionized entity. Our experience has shown this not to be the case. Current law sets a strict test in this regard, and National Labor Relations Board actions and court decisions protect workers against such an illegal practice. The balance struck by the Board and the courts under present law recognizes the basic principles of fairness while at the same time taking into account the transient nature of the construction industry.

The underlying principle of our labor laws, and which H.R. 281 would weaken, is grounded in respect for the decisions of individual workers and of assuring workers control over their own economic destinies through the collective bargaining process. Our labor laws guarantee that the choice of whether to join a union is the employee's, not the employer's and not the union's.

In recent years the construction industry has experienced rapid growth and with it, change. Response to that change needs to take the form of closer cooperation between labor and management. Our skilled trades are still the world's most productive. Industry and labor need to continue their dialogue to ensure that this productivity continues. We believe the Act as is provides a proper and adequate framework for that dialogue and therefore strongly oppose H.R. 281.

Enactment of H.R. 281 would mark a significant departure in labor-management relations policy. The ultimate question is whether the shorter term gains to one segment of the construction industry justify the consequences to employee protections under the National Labor Relations Act.

I urge you to oppose H.R. 281.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection to submission of this report from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM E. BROCK.

I want to again stress that I am urging a no vote on this bill. I would admit that there is need for an improved definition on single employer. I would think this committee and this body could have come to some kind of compromise on that, but unfortunately, we were not able to. There was an uncompromising position by the interest groups on both sides of this issue. They would not agree to a compromise.

Second, regarding the union, I do think that there should be a revision in terms of how majority support is defined. I would be prepared to work with the chairman of the committee to that extent. That does not mean elections. I agree with the chairman and probably the labor unions who believe that the election route process is unfeasible, but there are several ways available under current law that allow a showing of majority support even without an election. I think we could have come to an agreement.

The absence of such an agreement and such compromise, I must strongly oppose this bill and urge my colleagues to vote against it, with the expectation that this committee can do better.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COLEMAN].

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have had a great deal of material on this. If I could just ask a couple questions.

First of all, would a typical contract between a general contractor and an independent subcontractor establish a single employer status as envisioned by section 2(A) of H.R. 281?

I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLAY. The answer is no.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for that answer.

Mr. Chairman, therefore, this bill does not provide for common situs picketing; am I correct?

Mr. CLAY. That is correct.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. I thank the gentleman very much for answering these questions.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURPHY], a member of the committee.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Contract Security Act.

Once again, the basic right of construction workers to gain collective bargaining protection is under attack. Specific construction industry provisions of the Federal labor law, intended to assure protection of these rights, are being ignored through decisions of the National Labor Relations Board.

As a result, contractors today can freely ignore prehire agreements which allow a union to negotiate proper wages and conditions of employment. In addition, the NLRB has given sanction to the practice of double breasting wherein a contractor who has signed a prehire agreement establishes a second operation to perform the same work under essentially the same management and control as the original operation. Through the Board's decisions, contractors are now legally protected when they decide to walk away from their collective bargaining obligations.

Under current law, a prehire agreement between union and contractor is a one-sided agreement. Even when the union has lived up to its side of the agreement the contractor can easily avoid its obligation through double breasting or by simply walking away from the agreement.

H.R. 281 restricts double breasting by preventing employers from establishing second companies and transferring work from their union half to their nonunion half in order to avoid their collective bargaining agreements and obligations. Moreover, this legislation will prevent employers from repudiating prehire agreements they have voluntarily entered.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 281 will restore basic fairness to labor relations in the construction industry by requiring that collective bargaining agreements have a binding effect. And in fact, this was the original intent of Congress when the Landrum-Griffin Act was passed in 1959. H.R. 281 merely restores these rights.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the adoption of H.R. 281 to ensure stability in the construction industry, to reverse the erosion of construction worker's rights and to uphold the tradition of basic fairness in labor relations.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 281, the construction industry labor law amendments. This bill has been called a bill to prohibit double breasting in the construction industry, but what it's really about is double dealing.

The problem H.R. 281 would remedy is the destruction of collective bargaining in the construction industry. Collective bargaining cannot work if only one side is bound to keep its word. A system that depends on mutual respect cannot work if one party to the system is free to lie, free to renege on its promises, free to enjoy the benefits of collective bargaining without ever meeting its side of the bargain.

Sadly, that is what collective bargaining in the construction industry has come to. The unions keep their promises. They refer skilled trades people in a timely fashion, both union and nonunion. They abide by their no-strike pledges. And their members give a full day's work for a full day's pay.

But management, the contractors, have been given a license by the courts to renege on their end of the bargain. When they've gotten what they want from the unions and their members a great many firms simply turn their backs on them, repudiate the contracts they've given their word of honor to abide by, and leave the union's members jobless and bitter. It's double dealing, it's immoral, but through a perversion of the National Labor Relations Act, it's legal.

There are two ways this double dealing is accomplished—through the repudiation of prehire contracts and by the legal shell game called double breasting. For a quarter of a century since the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959, the vast majority of construction industry contracts have been prehire agreements, where the union promises to provide skilled workers to the employer and the employer agrees to pay union wages and benefits and to hire exclusively through the union hiring hall as long as qualified workers are referred in a timely way. Typically, such contracts are for a term of 3 years.

In section 8(f) of the act, Congress explicitly protected prehire contracts from attack on the grounds that no election had been conducted to determine majority support for the union. Representation elections take so long to conduct and to certify that in most cases a construction project and each craft's participation in the project would end before an election were held. Moreover, if the employer abides by its agreement to hire through the union hiring hall, most of the employees are likely to be union members satisfied with what their representation has won them. In the rare case where a majority didn't want the union or the obligation to pay dues, a decertification election or a deauthorization election could be conducted.

Section 8(f) was intended to legitimize and thereby encourage the adoption of prehire contracts. Congress was not so absurd and duplicitous as to make prehire agreements legal while simultaneously making them unenforceable. Nothing in section 8(f) says that such agreements are less binding than other labor agreements.

Nothing in section 8(f) says the courts should not enforce them.

The only provisos in section 8(f) concern discrimination and the contract bar rule regarding elections. Yet, first the NLRB and then the courts have perverted the intent of section 8(f) and robbed it of its force.

In R.J. Smith Construction Co. and Higdon Construction Co., the NLRB gave the employer the right to repudiate the prehire contract, to unilaterally stop abiding by the terms and conditions the employer agreed to, unless the union could show, at each new construction site, that it represented a majority of the employees.

An August 1984 decision of the NLRB in Acme Marble & Granite Co. shows just how unfair and pernicious this new rule is. The company signed an agreement with the Laborers Union in Western Missouri that within the union's geographic area, it would hire through the union's hiring hall and pay union wages and benefits. For 2 years, it did so. A majority of workers at the company's projects were union members.

In the third year of its contract, however, the company reneged on its agreement, bypassed the hiring hall, and deliberately hired all nonunion employees for its only project.

Naturally, the union could not show majority support since the company had deliberately hired a nonunion work force. When the union filed unfair labor practice charges, the NLRB dismissed them and rewarded the company for breaking its agreement. In a triumph of doubletalk and circular logic, the NLRB held that as long as the company breaks its word and refuses to use the hiring hall it has promised to use, thereby avoiding hiring union workers, it cannot be held to the terms of its contract.

Mr. Chairman, that is the kind of doubledealing H.R. 281 would make illegal.

The second technique the NLRB created to permit doubledealing in construction industry collective bargaining is double breasting. A unionized employer who has signed an agreement that specifies it will hire through the union hiring hall and pay union wages for all work done within the union's geographic and craft jurisdiction simply sets up a second company to do the same work in the same area in violation of the agreement. If the employer is careful to ensure that the companies have separate foremen, and its workers are hired off the street, rather than through the hiring hall, so there is no interchange of union and nonunion employees, it can completely escape its obligations to the union and its members.

The NLRB will say "Yes, obviously these two companies are a sham; they're really a single employer. But—because the employer violated its contract and bypassed the union hiring hall—all the workers at the second company are nonunion, so we won't apply the contract to them. They are nonunion employees and have no community of interest with union employees, so we'll deem the second company a separate bargaining unit."

Once again, the NLRB rewards doubledealing and duplicity. Once again the employer's violation of its agreement is used by the NLRB to justify its violation of the collective-bargaining agreement, regardless of the employees' wishes.

The Chamber of Commerce says that the unions' market share of construction has been cut in half during the last 25 years. Is it any wonder? When the Government treats union contracts with such contempt and disrepect and encourages employers to break their word and cheat union members of the jobs and benefits they have earned it's a wonder the unions have survived at all. The employer lobbyists say Congress should not intervene to upset the "delicate balance" of labor relations in the construction industry. The truth is that there's no balance at all—the NLRB has tipped the scales toward management and left the unions defenseless.

You'll hear speeches today that call these problems a matter of market economics, or something that should be worked out through collective bargaining rather than by legislation. But the law and its misinterpretation by the NLRB caused these problems, not the market, and no collective bargaining solution is possible.

Twisting its perverse logic even more, the NLRB has recently said it's illegal for a union even to try to protect itself against double breasting. The new general counsel has ruled that a union may not insist on contract clauses that require an employer to pay damages if it sets up subsidiaries or shell corporations to do work covered by its collective bargaining agreement with the union.

The NLRB has handcuffed the unions' hands behind their backs and given unethical employers a license to take advantage of them. H.R. 281 is designed to do no more than to remove those handcuffs and to give the unions a fair chance to protect themselves.

This bill has nothing to do with compulsory unionism or employee free choice. It has everything to do with doubledealing and vicious antiunionism. I urge my colleagues to vote against doubledealing and for H.R. 281. Let's make both parties to construction industry contracts as good as their word.

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this legislation, which would ensure the enforcement of collective-bargaining agreements in the construction industry.

This measure is absolutely necessary in order to close loopholes in Federal labor laws. Under the 1959 law, construction unions were allowed to enter into prehire agreements with an employer prior to the hiring of workers on a project. In return for the assurance of a skilled work force for the duration of the project, the employer agreed to working conditions set out in the contract. Employers now may repudiate these contracts once a full complement of workers has been hired, unless the union can prove majority status at all worksites.

Another loophole exists in decisions of the courts and the National Labor Relations Board which have allowed a construction contractor who has signed a collective-bargaining agreement with a union to establish a second, parallel company that is nonunion. This practice, known as double breasting, enables the employer to transfer work from the union operation to the nonunion company. The legislation now before us would eliminate this practice by making collective-bargaining agreements applicable to all businesses operated by a single employer within the geographic area covered by the agreement.

This bill does not expand the rights of organized labor under the Federal labor laws. It simply eliminates unfair labor practices that have been allowed to develop outside the scope of our existing laws. Our labor laws were established in order to ensure that employees who wish to organize and bargain collectively are able to do so without interference from an employer. Double breasting and the abrogation of prehire agreements unfairly penalize union workers and deny them working conditions for which they had bargained in good faith. These practices must be eliminated in order to ensure fair dealing between employers and workers in the construction industry. I therefore urge my colleagues to join me in passing this bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, H.R. 281 serves two commendable purposes: to render effective prehire agreements in the construction industry, which Congress sought to do a quarter of a century ago but has since been thwarted by rulings of the National Labor Relations Board; and to end the dishonest tactic of double breasting as a means of avoiding contractural obligations.

Double-breasted operations were relatively unknown until the early 1970's. The beginning of this trend toward contract evasion can be traced directly to the NLRB decision in the Peter Kiewit case of 1973, 206 NLRB 562. That case is described in the committee's report, and I will not burden the record by retracing its history. Essentially, however, Kiewit simply shifted the work which has previously been performed by employees of its union company to a nonunion company which became operational within the State for the first time expressly for that purpose. It is obvious to me that a system that permits an employer to evade his written agreement merely by setting up a new company to perform the same work outside the scope of that agreement is just plain wrong. That is not what Congress had in mind in 1935 when it guaranteed workers the right to bargain collectively, or in 1959 when it sought to strengthen and stabilize collective bargaining in the construction industry.

Nevertheless, the Labor Board allowed Kiewit to evade its collective bargaining agreement, primarily because the two companies separately controlled their day-to-day labor relations policy, and later because the Board determined that the employees of each company constituted a separate bargaining unit.

The Kiewit case has become a virtual roadmap for employers who seek to escape their collective bargaining agreements by setting up nonunion operations. The Board's 1973 decision contained a statement which has become a self-fulfiling prophecy. The Board said: "It is not uncommon in the construction industry for the same interests to have two separate organizations; one to handle contracts performed under union conditions, and other under nonunion conditions." Today, double breasting has become common and is openly acknowledged way of doing business. To permit this trend to continue would be injurious to the stability of labor relations in this vital industry and grossly unfair to the employees protected under the very collective bargaining agreements which Congress sanctioned in 1959.

Nor am I sympathetic to the argument that in many instances companies cannot remain competitive under a union agreement. Where economic conditions adversely affect the competitive position of a company with a collective bargaining agreement, our national labor policy requires that the union and employer sit down at the bargaining table to seek a mutually satisfactory solution. In other words, the problem is to be addressed through the collective bargaining process. Under the practice of double breasting, however, an employer decides on its own, unilaterally, if it is no longer competitive, and is free to walk away from its bargaining obligation simply by setting up another company which will do the same kind of work nonunion. I cannot sanction that practice, and I believe that H.R. 281 supplies an effective and just rememdy for it. I am pleased, therefore, to support H.R. 281.

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985. Critics of H.R. 281 also claim that they are concerned with the right of workers to choose whether or not they want to be represented by a union. This is simply not the case. More accurately, opponents of this legislation are not concerned with fairness and are not concerned with the rights of workers.

Congress had envisioned stability and fairness in the construction industry when it enacted the Landrum-Griffin Act in 1959. Today we face the practice of double breasting, which is nothing more than a means for unprincipled contractors to bypass contracts ratified through the collective-bargaining process. I call upon my colleageus to support H.R. 281 in order to eliminate this practice.

Mr. Speaker, for too long Federal labor law has allowed contractors to set up nonunion subsidiaries to evade their commitments to pay union wages and benefits. The point of H.R. 281 is to end these abuses and restore a fair set of guidelines for collective bargaining in the construction industry.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985.

H.R. 281 seeks to reverse the erosion of construction workers' rights as a result of recent hostile decisions by the National Labor Relations Board [NLRB] and restore stability to labor relations in the construction industry.

As my colleagues are aware, union certification election procedures, which are used in other industries covered by the NLRA, are usually impractical in the construction industry. They are impractical because the work is often completed before the representation question is settled. For this reason, current law permits employers and unions to enter into "prehire" agreements prior to construction and the hiring of workers.

Recent decisions by the courts and the NLRB have made it easier for some construction industry employers to aviod obligations contained in collective-bargaining agreements through the practice referred to as double breasting. Furthermore, the NLRB has ruled, and the Supreme Court has affirmed, that employers may repudiate prehire agreements with a union when a union does not represent a majority of the work force covered by the agreement on a particular project.

H.R. 281 does not call for a comprehensive overhaul of existing practice. It seeks to make the current situation more equitable and restore the original intent of Congress when, in 1959, it adopted the section 8(f) amendment of the National Labor Relations Act [NLRA]. For example, the measure would restrict the use of double breasting. H.R. 281 specifies that multiple firms should be considered a single employer if there is a direct or indirect common ownership, management, or control among the nominally separate businesses engaged in the same or similar work in the construction industry. Further, it requires such employers in the construction industry to apply the terms of a collective bargaining agreement to all their related entities within the geographical area covered by the agreement.

A second feature of H.R. 281 provides that a construction industry employer who has a prehire agreement will be obliged to comply with the terms of the agreement, regardless of whether the majority of workers on the specific job are represented by the union. The repudiation of such agreements would be allowed only after the NLRB conducts an election and determines that a majority of employees in an appropriate bargaining unit have selected another union to represent them or have chosen not to be represented by a union. Thus H.R. 281 would prevent employers from abrogating legitimate prehire agreements or setting up new companies for the specific purpose of evading the terms of existing collective-bargaining agreements.

This bill will not impose a union or a collective-bargaining agreement on employers against their will. And it will not impose a union contract on any of the genuinely independent and truly separate business entities in the construction industry.

H.R. 281 simply seeks to prevent the exploitation of workers and their unions by employers who voluntarily enter into contracts, obtain valuable services, and then evade their contractual obligations. This bill will help stem the bad-faith evasion of contracts and restore stability to collective bargaining in the construction trades.

I urge my colleagues to support the bill.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, today the House is considering H.R. 281, the construction industry labor law amendments. If enacted, this legislation would result in two basic outcomes: That of forcing construction companies to choose between operating as either all union or all nonunion, and denying construction workers the right to officially choose whether or not they want to be represented by a union. In my mind, this does not constitute either sound or fair public policy for workers.

Because the construction industry has become so competitive in recent years, many of its companies operate both union and open shops, where an employer with one or more union subsidiaries also operates one or more separate companies on a nonunion basis, the practice known as double breasting. Under current law, these dual shops are permitted under two conditions, first, if the two entities are operated independently of one another, and second, if they have not been created for the purpose of evading union contracts. At present, the NLRB determines whether or not such collective-bargaining agreements are binding on the nonunion firms on a case by case basis.

If enacted, H.R. 281 would require that the collective-bargaining agreement covering the employees of the unionized construction firm be imposed upon the employees of all other nonunion firms within the same geographical area covered by the agreement where there is "direct or indirect common ownership, management or control," and where the firms perform or otherwise conduct or supervise same or similar work, even if none of the employees of the nonunion subsidiary want to adhere to the decisions made by the union firm.

The second major provision of H.R. 281 would elevate prehire agreements to the same status as enforceable collective-bargaining agreements without regard to the majority status of the union. Generally, it is considered an unfair labor practice for an employer to recognize and enter into a collective-bargaining agreement with a union that does not represent a majority of the employees. However, in the construction industry, due to its temporary nature, the National Labor Relations Act allows employers to enter into prehire agreements with a union notwithstanding the undetermined majority status of the union. This agreement, may require union membership as a condition of employment, where not prohibited by State law and may also provide for union hall referral. While the union could not discriminate against nonunion members in providing such referral, those employees may be required to become union members after 7 days of employment.

In 1978, however, the Supreme Court affirmed an NLRB ruling that prehire agreements are allowed, but not binding in the absence of a majority status by the union. H.R. 281 would overturn this ruling and could result in a union with which a construction company holds a prehire agreement becoming the exclusive bargaining agent of the employees on that site, notwithstanding that a majority of workers may not want to represented by that union. This means that a minority of workers could control the job conditions of a majority of workers.

Many of the proponents of the bill argue that employers can evade their contractual obligations under a collective bargaining agreement by shifting work to nonunionized entities. However, according to the Department of Labor, this has not been the case. In fact, according to the Department, current law sets a strict test in this regard, and the National Labor Relations Board actions in combination with court decisions protect workers against such illegal practices.

While I am a strong believer and supporter of the right of workers to organize and particularly their right to bargain collectively, I would be quite concerned over enactment of any legislation that would deny construction workers or any other workers for that matter, the freedom of choice to determine whether or not their majority want to be represented by a specific union. Further, this bill would overturn past court and NLRB decisions made over the past 10 years which reflect the needs and realities of the current labor marketplace. Probably the biggest concern that I have however over the possible enactment of H.R. 281 would be that the bill might actually backfire on union workers. With the open shop market at 60 to 70 percent of the labor market, and growing, this bill could actually result in reduced numbers of union workers being hired, due to the threat that employers would be forced to decide whether to become all union or all nonunion.

In summary, I feel that my voting record reflects my support for legislation that realistically benefits workers. I do not however, feel that H.R. 281 is a proworker bill. Quite the contrary, I feel that H.R. 281 would weaken the underlying principle of our labor laws, that of assuring workers the right to make individual decisions through the collective bargaining process. Therefore, I am opposed to the enactment of H.R. 281 and must vote against its passage.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the passage of H.R. 281, the construction industry labor law amendments, would not be in the best interest of workers, businesses, and Louisiana, and hence I am opposing the bill's passage. Louisiana is suffering with the highest unemployment rate in the Nation, and she vitally needs jobs to put her people back to work. She does not need legislation which would have the effect not only of discouraging future business investment that means more jobs but also of hampering the free choice of workers whether or not to be represented by a union.

I believe the bill would require essentially a choice between an entirely nonunion or entirely unionized shop which would be detrimental to both business and workers, resulting in questions as to the survival of union shops and in fewer jobs. If Louisiana employers under this bill, if it became law, chose to be entirely unionized, they would then lose contracts to out-of-State nonunion contractors and Louisiana workers would lose jobs. If Louisiana employers went the other direction and chose to be entirely nonunion, then union workers would lose their unions. That choice forced by the bill is unnecessary and harmful.

We should not impose on business legislation with which there are questions and concerns as to the impact and costs, and it is an inopportune time for Louisiana to be saddled with legislation which could cause the lose of jobs and business investment.

H.R. 281 would force union coverage on construction employees who do not have an opportunity to make their own decision whether they want to be represented by a union. Additionally, prehire agreements which set the terms of employment on a construction site would be immediately binding without employees having a say on the agreement or the union, and workers would be prevented from removing them except through a long proceeding.

Current law creates a balance which considers the shifting employment patterns in the construction industry and still preserves the basic right of workers to make their own choice on union representation.

Louisianians are as independent individuals as you will find—whether we are talking about an employee or a businessman—and they want to be free to make their own decisions and not be dictated to by the Federal Government through misguided legislation.

I cannot support legislation which is not good for the workers and businesses of Louisiana. Louisiana needs business dollars, construction dollars—dollars which would go for new jobs for Louisiana workers and for revenues to the cities and communities which know that Louisiana is fighting for her life.

I'll fight for economic development, business investment, and expansion and other positive approaches to ensure jobs rather than questionable labor reform legislation which could restrict job opportunities for Louisiana.

I'll fight for the freedom of choice—for workers and for business, but H.R. 281 does not do this.

For Louisiana's employment future, I cast my vote against H.R. 281.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, our labor laws are grounded in respect for the decisions of the individual workers and we have worked hard to ensure that the choice of whether to join a union is the employee's, not the employer's, and not the union's. H.R. 281 denies this freedom of choice that we, as Americans, have prided ourselves on.

In 1959, Congress upheld the legality of prehire agreements to accommodate the unique characteristics of the construction industry. A union and a contractor can now set the terms of employment before any workers are hired. That agreement, however, is not—and should not be—binding until a majority of workers at the site support it. Until that time, a contractor can repudiate the agreement.

Under this bill, a prehire agreement would be binding; workers would not have the opportunity to choose their own representation or terms of employment. Clearly, this is compulsory unionism.

Furthermore, this bill would extend the collective bargaining contracts of a construction company's unionized subsidiary to all of its nonunion operations because the bill mandates that collective bargaining contracts made with a single employer be applied to all of the business entities of that single employer within the geographical area covered by the collective bargaining agreement. This too is compulsory unionism.

If this bill becomes law, a labor dispute with a general contractor could spread to all subcontractors on a job site who are subjected to a contractor's control. Or, a union could shut down an entire project because of a dispute with one subcontractor—forcing innocent workers out of work and subjecting neutral subcontractors to labor disputes over which they have no recourse. This is called common situs picketing and it is illegal. Congress—and the public—have repeatedly rejected this.

This bill is antibusiness and antiworker. It denies freedom of choice, threatens to send construction costs soaring, jeopardizes construction employment, and upsets the balance in labor-management relations. It is a dangerous precedent with far-reaching consequences.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1986.

We in the Congress have a responsibility to insure that workers' rights are adequately addressed. This legislation is but a simple tenent to protect those basic rights. The construction industry needs more clearly defined protection regulations due to the uniqueness of its business. Unlike industrial workers who report to a fixed site for several years, construction workers face shifting job sites and modified work periods. A prehire agreement insures the construction worker that he or she will work once a job is completed. This brings continuity and stability to their employment status. Unfortunately, through double-breasting employers have been able to renege on this commitment. Instead of giving the work to those it has been promised to under the prehire agreement, construction employers have been setting up related companies which operate on a nonunion basis and allow this second company to perform the work. This is in direct violation of section 8(f) of the 1959 National Labor Relations Act. H.R. 281 will prohibit this practice. The Federal labor laws in the 1930's gave workers the right to join a union and bargain with their employer. The special nature of the construction industry often abridges those rights. Through H.R. 281 we are reaffirming the commitment made through Federal labor laws. I call upon the Members of this body to recognize the importance of this bill and support its passage.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 281. This bill has my support because of what it does for the people who work in the construction trades. They aren't asking for the Sun, the Moon, and the stars. All they want is a fair deal when it comes to how our labor laws are being interpreted by the National Labor Relations Board.

Saying good things about the construction worker is the "in" thing to do these days. It should be. We now have television commercials that salute American workers "for all you do"; and others that want to reward the construction people "when the day is done."

Those are terrific images: The mighty building project being brought in on time by our workers. But there is something wrong with the picture. The employers on these construction projects have convinced the National Labor Board that they don't have to live up to the contracts they have signed with their employee representatives. Instead of salutes, the construction workers are getting a lot of fancy footwork from the Board.

We have had an excellent presentation of the provisions of this bill from the distinguished chairman of the Labor Management Subcommittee. Let me give you an example of how the construction workers are treated in the real world. Let us say two construction workers ride to work together, one works for the Sam Construction Co. and the other works for the Son of Sam Construction Co. Except for their names, there is no difference between these two companies. Same management; same offices; same everything. But one has signed a contract to build projects with union help—that is Tom—and the other—Tom, Jr., is nonunion.

The first worker is employed by Tom and is paid and works under a union contract. The second worker is not covered by the contract and is paid far less. How could this happen? It happened because the Labor Board said Tom, Jr., was "independent" of Tom. That is not fair.

We are not talking about a construction employer who is nonunion. We are talking about an employer who has signed a contract and has found a cute way to avoid it.

More to the point, this bill is not a extreme or even a mild change in congressional policies on labor management relations in the construction industry. It is a return to what we did in the 1959 amendments to the National Labor Relations Act. This bill stops the Labor Board from turning our policy on its head.

The employers are trying to scare us into believing that we are giving the workers a blank check at the bargaining table. Nothing could be further from the truth. Tom, Jr., can still come to the Labor Board and show that his company is truly independent of Tom, if it is. This bill provides a level playing field to do that on.

H.R. 281 is a good bill. It takes the "con" out of construction industry labor relations. It gives the workers and the employers an even chance to show that a contract has meaning. That is how this system is supposed to work.

Thank you.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in opposition to H.R. 281, the "Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985." H.R. 281 is a damaging piece of legislation which adversely impacts employees and employers alike. While the proponents of this bill say that its purpose is to increase the stability of collective bargaining in the building and construction industry, what I believe it represents is another effort to "reunionize" the construction industry without regard to the feelings of the employees.

If enacted, H.R. 281 would impose collective bargaining agreements on workers who have not been allowed the freedom to choose which union, if any, should represent them. This legislation would further restrict the freedom of employees by giving any prehire agreement, setting terms of employment, the same binding status as a collective bargaining agreement. Consequently, H.R. 281 does not promote stability, but instead encourages the destabilization of current labor relations.

The construction industry is now protected by fair procedures established by the National Labor Relations Board and court precedent, and understood by the industry. The sponsors of H.R. 281 may intend to give further protection to employees, but I would characterize the bill as an exercise in Government sponsored compulsory unionism.

What mystifies me is that the bill has been considered at all. It is not expected to be enacted even if the House should, in error, happen to pass it.

I urge my colleagues to vote against H.R. 281.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, because of a previous engagement, I will not be able to cast my vote on final passage of H.R. 281. I had hoped that consideration of this legislation would have been completed before I left the floor, however this was not the case. I have attempted to pair myself on the key amendment to this bill and on final passage. If this cannot be accomplished, I would like the RECORD to show that had I been present I would have voted no on the Jeffords substitute amendment and yes on final passage.

Thank you for this opportunity to make my position on this bill known.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to vote in favor of the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1986 only after receiving the explicit assurances offered in the report on this legislation, in the statements of the floor manager and in the AuCoin amendment that legitimate subcontracting arrangements are in no way affected by this legislation.

I am proud to say that, in my own State of South Dakota, the practice of double breasting at which this legislation is properly aimed, is extremely rare. What is not rare, though, is the use of legitimate subcontracting arrangements between independent parties. Contractors in my State are extremely concerned that the provisions of this legislation not be extended to cover the legitimate, independent relationships upon which they depend.

Should the construction industry labor law amendment somehow clear the other body and the President's desk and become law, and should the very firm guarantees we have received concerning the nonapplicability of this law to business relationships between independent contractors and subcontractors be violated in any way, I would immediately author and would enthusiastically support legislation to repeal this amendment.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1986. I have carefully weighed the arguments made for and against the bill, and I have endeavored to be particularly sensitive to the arguments made by employers to the effect that this legislation will somehow adversely affect their ability to compete. If I felt that this bill unfairly or unjustly limited the ability of employers to compete, I would not and could not support it. I am convinced, however, that H.R. 281 does not inhibit the ability of employers in the construction industry to compete. It simply requires employers to live up to contractual arrangements that the employers, themselves, have voluntarily entered.

The most serious argument that has been raised against the bill is that double breasting is necessary if a construction company is to maintain needed flexibility in the marketplace. Specifically, it is contended that union companies compete in different market segments and should not be deprived of the opportunity of also competing for open shop contracts. In fact, H.R. 281 does not impair the ability of a contractor to compete for open shop contracts in other market sectors. For example, under the provisions of H.R. 281 a contractor subject to a collective bargaining agreement covering industrial construction would be free to pursue residential construction on a nonunion basis; also, a contractor subject to a collective bargaining agreement covering carpentry work is free to pursue masonry work on a nonunion basis; and a contractor subject to an agreement covering the District of Columbia is free to pursue nonunion work in Virginia, Maryland, or anywhere outside the District of Columbia. The provisions of H.R. 281 are applicable only where a contractor seeks to avoid obligations he voluntarily incurred by performing work on a nonunion basis that is otherwise subject to a collective bargaining agreement.

Opponents of the bill have also contended that if we bind a construction company to contractual promises it has voluntarily made it will lose contracts if it has to depend exclusively on union labor. In point of fact, because of the nature of the industry the building trades unions are also directly subjected to the same market pressures. Very simply, if union contractors cannot win contracts, union workers do not work. Further, since the short-term nature of construction employment forces the unions to rely upon voluntary prehire agreements with employers, the building trades are also under long-term incentives to ensure that their contracts are competitive. Employers do not voluntarily commit themselves to contracts that are not competitive. Double breasting is not a necessary response to competitive pressures, it is simply a means of avoiding collective bargaining.

Finally, there is nothing in H.R. 281 that requires employers to enter into collective bargaining or prehire agreements with a union in the first place. If an employer decides that his interests are better served by proceeding on a nonunion basis, there is nothing in the bill that would prevent the employer from refusing to enter such agreements. There is nothing in this measure that would unfairly inhibit an employer's ability to compete, nor does the legislation unduly mitigate the competitive pressures of the marketplace on construction unions.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 281 is intended solely to ensure that employers live up to those contracts they have voluntarily entered. That, I submit, is good policy in any context and I urge you to vote for this bill.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, we have before us today the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments, H.R. 281, which will remedy certain adverse decisions of the National Labor Relations Board [NLRB] with regard to the construction industry. From the earliest days of the Wagner Act in 1935, it was recognized that union election procedures designed for the industrial workplace could not be directly transferred to the construction industry. A 1959 amendment to the act, the Landrum-Griffin Act, permitted prehire agreements and was intended to provide workers in the construction industry with an effective opportunity to secure union representation.

Union certification procedures, which are used in other industries covered by the National Labor Relations Act, are usually impractical in the construction industry because workers are constantly working at different job sites, and projects may be completed before a certification election can be held. For this reason, current law permits employers and unions to enter into "prehire" agreements prior to construction and the hiring of employees. Under these agreements, an employer and a union agree that work will be performed in accordance with a union contract.

In recent years, however, two separate sets of NLRB decisions have developed which erode the ability of construction workers to secure and retain the protections of collective bargaining. One set of cases has permitted the wholesale repudiation of lawful prehire collective bargaining agreements. The other set allows the avoidance of collective bargaining agreements through corporate shell games.

Under one set of cases, the Board held that employers may repudiate valid prehire agreements at will unless the union can prove that the employer has a stable work force in which it has established a majority support, or can demonstrate majority support on each separate job site. But stable work forces are a rarity in this industry, which was the reason for the original prehire amendment in 1959.

In the second set of cases, the Board permits the avoidance of lawful collective bargaining agreements through the use of double-breasted companies. A typical example is company A, which has a collective bargaining agreement with a union, sets up a related company—company B—which it operates on a nonunion basis. In some cases, most of the work formerly done by company A is now done by company B. In other situations, company A may go out of business altogether.

The Board placed its imprimatur on this double-breasting device, which then spawned an ever-growing use of this technique for avoiding lawful contracts. The structural characteristics of the construction industry leaves workers defenseless to such corporate manipulations. The project-by-project ebb and flow of the employment relationship allows for corporate restructuring schemes and disappearing acts with the greatest of ease.

To remedy these problems, the construction industry labor law amendments specify that multiple construction firms should be considered a single employer if there is a direct or indirect common ownership, management, or control among the nominally separate businesses engaged in the same or similar work. It requires such employers to apply the terms of a collective bargaining agreement to all of their related entities within the geographical area covered by the agreement.

Collective bargaining agreements will not be imposed on truly separate or independent companies. Instead, the bill requires that common ownership, management and control be considered in determining whether two or more companies should be considered a single employer. The bill would apply only to companies that perform similar work in the construction industry. The fact that one company has a small interest in another, or that an individual company has dealings with the other company would not be sufficient to declare two companies a single employer. The bill will, however, prevent a company with union workers from setting up another nonunion company to perform the same work.

The bill merely prohibits employers or unions from repudiating agreements, which both have agreed to, before their expiration. It does not expand the existing authority to make prehire agreements in the construction industry, and it does not impose a union on employees against their will. Employees would be allowed to decertify a union which represents them, but neither they nor the employer would be permitted to break an agreement into which both entered freely. The bill guarantees that after both parties have already reached agreement, a company cannot break prehire agreements at will, and force the unions to demonstrate majority support through a union certification election on every job site.

I believe this legislation addresses the unique collective bargaining complications inherent in the construction industry. The unusual nature of collective bargaining in the construction industry is no different today than it was 27 years ago. Yet, this bill does not grant new or expanded considerations to construction workers, but merely returns us—and the NRLB—to the original intent of Congress when it passed the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this long overdue legislation.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985.

Before I state my reason for opposing H.R. 281, I want to say that I am not antiunion, but I do support choice in the decision for union representation. Unions historically have played an important role throughout the world in improving working conditions. I do recognize the tremendous contributions the members of our skilled trades have made toward the high productivity and quality found in the construction industry in the United States. By my actions, I aim to ensure that the high productivity and quality continue unabated.

Supporters of H.R. 281 claim that employers can avoid contractual obligations under a collective bargaining agreement by establishing nonunion entities. This assertion is false. The record of cases heard before the National Labor Relations Board substantiates that current law already protects against such abuses. The delicate balance which has been achieved by the NLRB and the courts under current law accounts for fairness while simultaneously recognizing the transient and increasingly competitive nature of the construction industry.

I fear that enactment of H.R. 281 would seriously upset this delicate balance. The construction industry in recent years has grown and changed substantially due to natural responses to internal and external conditions. Instead of imposing further disorienting change, I believe the response should be greater cooperation within the framework of present law.

In Texas particularly, this is not the time to impose unsubstantiated changes with profound economic implications on a major industry. Present law allows for the optimum situation for both employers and employees. It should not be changed.

I received numerous letters from construction industry employees and employers alike urging me to vote against this bill. Employees said they did not want their right to choose whether to work union or nonunion to be taken away from them. Moreover, employers said enactment of H.R. 281 would increase their cost considerably and harm their competitiveness, undermining further productivity gains and development. These are more than adequate reasons for not making an unfounded, fundamental change in our labor laws.

Therefore, I must oppose H.R. 281 in the interests of ensuring the individual's right to choose his or her representation and of maintaining the delicate balance in construction industry labor relations which has facilitated growth and economic development. Both of these aspects I am striving to protect are fundamental to the continued individual and collective prosperity of the United States.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, each section of the bill is considered as having been read under the 5-minute rule.

The Clerk will designate section 1.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The text of H.R. 281 is as follows:

H.R. 281

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be referred to as the "Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985".

SEC. 2. (a) Section 2(2) of the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C. 151(2)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "In the construction industry, any two or more business entities performing or otherwise conducting or supervising the same or similar work, in the same or in different geographical areas, and having any direct or indirect common ownership, management or control, shall be deemed a single employer.".

(b) Section 8(d) of such Act (29 U.S.C. 158(d)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:

"Whenever the collective bargaining involves employees of a business entity comprising part of a single employer in the construction industry, as defined in section 2(2) of this Act, the duty to bargain collectively, for the purposes of this section, shall include the duty to apply the terms of a collective bargaining agreement between such business entity and a labor organization to all other business entities comprising the single employer within the geographical area covered by the agreement.".

(c) Section 8(f) of such Act (29 U.S.C. 158(f)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "geographical area:" in clause (4) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "geographic area. An agreement lawfully made pursuant to this subsection shall impose the same obligations under this Act as an agreement made with a majority representative pursuant to section 9(a):"; and

(2) by inserting before the period at the end of such section and the following new proviso: ": Provided further, That any agreement lawfully made pursuant to this subsection may be repudiated only after the Board certifies the results of an election conducted pursuant to section 9(c), in which a majority of employees in an appropriate bargaining unit selects a bargaining representative other than the labor organization with which such agreement was made or chooses not to be represented by a labor organization".

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: page 2, line 6, strike out "151(2))" and insert in lieu thereof "152(2))".

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. CLAY

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on behalf of myself and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AUCOIN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLAY: Page 3, strike out lines 1 and 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

having, directly or indirectly—

"(a) substantial common ownership,

"(b) common management, or

"(c) common control,

shall be deemed a single employer.".

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. AUCOIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman and colleagues, I join Mr. CLAY in offering this amendment because of concerns that have been expressed to me and to others over one particular aspect of this bill. I have heard it said that the present definition of "single employer" could lead to the result that the holding of a single share of stock in another construction company, or that a miniscule investment in that second company could in some way satisfy the "single employer" test.

Such contentions are in clear contradiction with legislative history. The committee report, I think, is explicit that it is not the intention or the effect of the bill, and with that in mind, I offer this amendment to insure that the statute language comports with the legislative history.

This amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY] and I would require a substantial degree of common ownership before two business entities may be considered a single employer for the purposes of H.R. 281.

My amendment should be adopted. It puts to rest any concern that H.R. 281 reaches beyond what we know to be double-breasting. No two separate business entities would be bound by an agreement signed by one if their only connection was some small degree of common ownership. The language of my amendment, instead, makes it very clear that to meet the ownership test the degree of common ownership must be substantial.

Mr. Chairman, in seeking to address this issue, I thought of a number of different alternatives, including requiring a specific percentage of ownership in a second company. However, I concluded after thinking that through, and other alternatives, that no one figure could be appropriate in all situations, and for that reason this test of substantiality will meet the concerns that have been expressed, while not binding the courts in any way to some arbitrary figure that may have no relevance to the specific facts of a case at hand.

It is clear what the intention of the amendment is. It should remove any ambiguity that any Member might think exists. It does comport, as I say, with the committee report language, and I hope the sponsors of the bill and Members of the House will join me in supporting this amendment.

I thank the chairman of the committee for joining me in sponsoring this amendment.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I think this is a good amendment as far as it goes. At least it is a step in the right direction.

I would just ask the gentleman if his definition of "single employer" could include the statement of the single employer being a single integrated enterprise, which I think is what (a), (b), and (c) here in the gentleman's amendment are directed at, but "single integrated enterprise", I think, would remove all ambiguity and correct the problems in the definition of the bill.

Mr. CLAY. I believe that the amendment does correct all ambiguities. As I interpret the amendment, it says it does not impose single employer status simply because the owner of a construction company also owns a small share of stock in some independent, nonunion construction company.

I do not see any ambiguity. Maybe we ought to refer it to the principal sponsor for his comment.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. If I could just respond to the gentleman, I think he has an "or" in there rather than "and".

Mr. CLAY. Yes. That is one of the components.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Therefore, I think that the single integrated enterprise makes the point that we want to make.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY] has expired.

(On request of Mr. BARTLETT and by unanimous consent, Mr. CLAY was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

□ 1420

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have two questions about the gentleman's amendment. The first one, and I am trying to understand it, I am looking at the terms of the bill, the first one, and this is the bill itself, on page 2 of the committee print, line 10, as I see the committee print, it provides for any two or more business entities in the same or in different geographical areas would still be a single employer if it meets the other tests. Is the gentleman saying under this amendment, and I would ask both gentleman, under this amendment, it does not correct that in the sense that if there are still different geographic areas, that stays in the bill, the term 'different geographical areas"?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman will yield further, is it the gentleman's intention that if there are two or more business entities that have met the test under the gentleman's amendment, substantial common ownership or so forth, that are in two different geographical areas, that they would be deemed to be a single employer even though they are in different geographical areas? I am trying to understand the gentleman's intention.

Mr. CLAY. Yes, I would agree with the gentleman's interpretation.

Mr. BARTLETT. So if the gentleman will yield further, then the first part of my question is that different geographical areas, even though two entities are in different geographical areas, west coast, east coast, perhaps, they would still be a single employer in this amendment?

Mr. CLAY. No.

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's point really does not point to any substantive problem. In the contract and all of the contracts in this area cover a limited a specific geographic area, if identical ownership, identical management, but in a different geographical area not covered by that contract, for instance, not the District of Columbia metropolitan area, or not the six southern California counties, if the employer's other site is outside of that geographic area, he is not bound by the agreement. Nothing in this bill, before the amendment or after the amendment, would make him bound. So I think the gentleman's point, while technically correct, has no meaning as to the thrust of the legislation.

Mr. CLAY. I think the gentleman has explained it precisely. The terms of the contract will determine what the geographical area is, and the two parties have to agree on that. So you cannot leave that geographical area that is written into the contract and go someplace else with it.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman would yield further, I understand.

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the geographical area is not the difference of opinion, is not covered by this amendment to the committee bill.

Mr. CLAY. That is correct.

Mr. BARTLETT. My second question is this, and it revolves around one word in the gentleman's amendment, and that word is "or." As I understand, any of these three tests, substantial, common ownership, common management or common control, if any one of those three are met, then it would be termed to be a single employer; is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. CLAY. That is my interpretation.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman will yield further, I am reading from the committee report on page 7 which seems to indicate that the opposite is true, and I wonder if the gentleman would clarify it. Under section 1, under the section entitled "Summary: The Limited Scope of H.R. 281," and I apologize, but I had not seen the gentleman's amendment until just now when he offered it, about halfway down the paragraph, it states:

> The bill provides that several factors, such as common ownership, common management, and common control are to be viewed in the aggregate to determine single-employer status.

The gentleman intends to say it could be any one of the three and not all three, as the report would seem to indicate.

Mr. CLAY. I am not attempting to change any meaning that is in the report. It is precisely as it is presented in this amendment, and it is my feeling that if there is any disagreement, the courts are free to determine what this legislation does or does not say.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. AuCOIN. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

One of the reasons for this change in the use of the word "or," if you are looking at the text of the amendment, I say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] is that the purpose of the amendment is to make use of the term "substantial" in only one instance, and that is with regard to common ownership, and not with regard to common management or common control. Therefore, you see a slightly different construction and that is where that involves the use of the word "or." Substantial, if the gentleman would yield to me, pertains to common ownership.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do so having a great deal of respect for the two gentlemen who have offered it. I would comment that it is an improvement over the present bill.

However, the amendment still provides, as we have discussed, the terminology of different geographical areas. But more importantly, it still provides a single employer to be any employer, as I understand it, having directly or indirectly common ownership, common management, or common control. So therefore, I assume if someone had indirectly substantial ownership or indirectly, let us say, common management, then I would be afraid that the courts could interpret that indirect common management to say if two companies had one manager that worked sometimes for one and sometimes the other that was not involved in the bidding process, perhaps just in the construction process, perhaps just a foreman, then it would be regarded as a single employer. And my opposition is that that is still not fair to the employees who are employed by that other subsidiary and those employees have chosen not to be bound by the terms and conditions of a union prehire agreement.

All I am asking for essentially is fairness. My point is, and I will later have and have prepared and will share with the other side an amendment that I think does what the gentleman is attempting to do. But it does it much more tightly. That would be taking the language of the committee report which was offered by the majority and using that language to provide a requirement of an interrelationship of operations and common ownership, management or control, so it requires the interrelationship and to specify that it would be not found to be an arm's length relationship existing among integrated companies.

I supposed our difference is that it is my judgment that in the current marketplace that construction employees are better off if they are able to choose between an open shop and a union shop, and if indeed that employer or that entity is able to have two different kinds of companies, with some relationships, but they have to bid separately, they have to be at arm's length, they cannot take one contract and fulfill it with the other contract, as the NLRB has ruled from time to time, then my amendment, I think, which I will offer in a moment, would be much more clear in terms of accomplishing the gentleman's objective.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding. But I would have to say to the gentleman that I do not think there is any lack of clarity in the amendment that I offered. The bill, as written, does not refer to substantial common ownership.

My amendment inserts the term "substantial" which makes it very clear that we are talking about substantial common ownership. That is an improvement, and I appreciate the gentleman having recognized that.

With regard to common management or common control, the bill states that any direct, any direct or any indirect common management or common control shall be deemed a single employer. This amendment drops the word "any", and it clearly comports with what we were achieving by the insertion of the term "substantial" in the case of common ownership, making it clear that miniscule common management or a degree is not what we are trying to bar, but only a direct, very direct and clearly indirect but still nevertheless clearly indirect common management of common control shall be deemed a single employer. It is an improvement over the bill. It does, I think, without impinging on the rights of workers, meet any concern one might have that the definition reaches too far.

So I would have to say to the gentleman I think my amendment should solve his concerns, and I think it is tightly drafted and very clear.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman for his comments. I do think the gentleman has made an improvement by removing the word "any" and including the word "substantial", at least with regard to substantial common ownership.

Mr. AUCOIN. Then I invite my friend's support for my amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. However, the gentleman did not include the word "substantial" in management.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. CLAY

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLAY: At the end of the bill, add the following new section:

SEC. 3. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b), the amendments made by section 2 shall take effect upon the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) The requirement imposed by the amendment made by section 2(b) shall take effect—

(1) one year after such date of enactment with respect to any building and construction project for which the contract was entered into by an employer before the date of the enactment of this Act; and

(2) on the date on which the contract is entered into with respect to any new building or contruction project for which the contract is entered into by employer on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.

Mr. CLAY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do so for the purpose of inquiring of the Chair at this point, or perhaps the author, as to whether or not this is a new section 3, or whether this would preclude further amendments to section 2 of the bill if this amendment is adopted?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The Chair would point out to the gentleman from Vermont that the bill is now open for amendment at any point, as was requested by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY] a little while earlier.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I thank the Chair for that clarification.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELBY].

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Chairman, I join with the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Missouri, in asking the Members to support this amendment that he is offering on behalf of himself and me.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment addresses a concern that enactment of H.R. 281 might be unfair to contractors with construction projects already underway. The amendment assures that contractors involved in ongoing projects have a year before the act takes effect.

H.R. 281 is basically a sound bill because it would put an end to the unfair practice of double-breasting that has plagued the construction industry. There is no reason that consenting parties to a contract should be allowed to wiggle out of their agreements. Nevertheless double-breasting has flourished and construction workers no longer have the assurance that contractors have to live by their agreements. It seems to me unfair that all other employers, once they sign a collective-bargaining agreement, are required by law to live up to it, while in the construction industry contractors can take advantage of a huge loophole in the law that lets them walk away from signed contracts to which they voluntarily agreed. When people voluntarily promise in writing to do something, the law shouldn't let them ignore the promise. H.R. 281 simply closes the loophole that has let double-breasting spread.

There has been a concern raised that the bill would unfairly catch unsuspecting contractors that are already at work on a project. I have sympathy with this concern and that is why I offer my amendment. The amendment gives everyone fair notice before the bill takes affect. If enacted H.R. 281 would apply to all projects not yet in progress. The effective date would be delayed however to accommodate already existing contractual obligations. If the construction has started and the contractors had relied on interpretations of the law in effect when the project began, it is only fair to allow sufficient time to adjust to the change in the law. One year from date of enactment gives everyone ample time to adjust.

I believe my amendment improves a good bill.

Mr. CLAY. I thank the gentleman and I support the amendment. I think his point is well made in that it is not my intention to entrap those who may be unable to make such adjustments as may be required by this bill.

The amendment is well crafted, and I think it protects the legitimate rights of workers as well as contractors, and certainly does not conflict with the intent of the legislation under consideration.

Therefore, I urge adoption of the amendment.

□ 1435

Mr. JEFFORDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I would say that I have reviewed the amendment and I would say at least personally, I have no objection to it, as I think it is an improvement in the bill; although it certainly has not removed my objections to the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment, and I have commented to my good friend, the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Missouri, that he does appear to be making some progress which we were not able to make in committee, of cleaning up the bill, at least in piecemeal. I would comment that he has chosen, I think, some of the least offensive parts about the bill so far, but I do commend him for making progress.

I would comment that similar amendments and attempts to reach agreements on what should be in the bill were not able to be made in committee, and I regret that, and I know that the ranking member of the full committee and the ranking member of the subcommittee had tried at that time, and have tried diligently since to obtain some adjustment in the bill to cause him to be much more of a commonsense bill.

The bill, however, even with this rather marginal amendment which talks about date of enactment, still does not make any sense, because what is essentially wrong with the legislation is that it is unfair legislation both to union employees and to nonunion employees.

Let me go in for a minute as to why it is unfair to union employees. Because if we pass legislation as radical as this is, if we pass legislation such as this which in effect requires every contractor in America to choose between having a union shop subsidiary or an open shop subsidiary, then over a period of time the marketplace may well cause those contractors to close down their union shops. I think that would be a regrettable result of this legislation.

I think it would be an inevitable result of this legislation because the contractors will follow the marketplace. I think there is a clear and a good market today for union construction, and I think that if we pass this legislation—whether we pass it today and make it effective 1 year from now or whether we make it effective immediately, it is still going to have the effect of putting a lot of people out of work.

Some of them are going to be your constituents. Some of them are going to be my constituents; and that is not fair to them.

I will be offering in a moment, Mr. Chairman, two amendments. The first one would be to I think meet the intent of a requirement of substantial common ownership and management and require interrelation between those before we define someone as a single employer.

After that I will be offering an amendment that I think will go to the heart of this bill, and that will be called the secret ballot amendment, which will provide that, regardless of anything else, that before a group of employees in an open shop subsidiary that have previously not been bound by a prehire agreement, before they can be bound by that prehire agreement, they will have the right, one time only—they will have the right prior to that requirement to have a secret ballot election to determine if they want to be bound by the terms and conditions of that agreement.

I think that is a fair amendment. I think that after all is said and done this afternoon, that requirement for a secret ballot will determine the outcome of this legislation, determine whether this Congress is willing to speak for the rights of employees.

So I will support the gentleman's amendment as drafted, but say that it is still only nibbling around the edges.

I yield to my colleague from Texas [Mr. ARMEY].

Mr. ARMEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question to refresh my memory. Was the gentleman's amendment offered in the committee?

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is correct. I offered not one, but I believe two different versions of a secret ballot amendment; they were broader amendments than will be offered today, and they were rejected or the chairman of the subcommittee correctly, I think, called a point of order in their rule to be nongermane.

In the meantime, I have narrowed the focus of the amendments to provide that they would only apply to this industry and to this section, and only to those employees that are thrown into a prehire agreement without their will under this bill.

So the amendment, as presently drafted, will be clearly germane.

Mr. ARMEY. I thank the gentleman. It is nice to see that we can get secret ballot elections germane to the labor law.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman for his comments and yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BARTLETT

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARTLETT: Page 2, line 8, strike out "performing" and all that follows through line 2 on page 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following: that—

"(a) perform or otherwise conduct or supervise the same or similar work, in the same or in different geographical areas; and

"(b) upon viewing the totality of the relevant circumstances in the aggregate, have a substantial qualitative degree of interrelationship of operations and common ownership, management, or control which would not be found in an arm's length relationship existing among unintegarated companies, shall be deemed single employer.".

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to clarify the definition of a single employer that is contained in H.R. 281. I would comment that this amendment further improves on an amendment that had been made earlier by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY] in combination with the gentleman from Oregon, but the amendment made earlier did not go far enough and did not completely clarify the situation.

I have drawn most of the text of the amendment from indeed the committee report, written by the majority. The report states that:

A single employer relationship will only be found when all of the relevant circumstances viewed in the aggregate show that the relationship between the entities is not an arm's length one.

I refer to both the bill and to the amended version of the bill and conclude that there is no comment about the aggregate or the arm's length.

It further states that:

The mere fact that one company may have a "miniscule investment" in a second company, will not be sufficient to make those entities a "single employer" within the meaning of the bill.

The test that would be applied in making such determinations under H.R. 281, according to the report, would be the: "Test for determining single employer status stated in the D.C. Circuit's Kiewit opinion."

The test as stated in that opinion is whether there is, "A substantial qualitative degree of interrelationship of operations and common management."

I will stop at that point. "* * * commented that the bill as drafted does not mention interrelationship of operations at all."

The D.C. Circuit's opinion goes on to say that "one that we are satisfied would not be found at arm's length or arm's length relationship existing among unintegrated companies."

That is from Operating Engineers Local 627 versus NLRB.

Any reading of the bill would indicate a substantial difference between the actual language of section 2(a) in the bill and the description of that language articulated in the committee report.

The bill states that business entities having any direct or indirect common ownership, management or control—and the gentleman has taken out the word any—shall be deemed a single employer; but the word "or" clearly bars a weighing of circumstances in the aggregate as an absolute test.

Indeed, no room whatsoever would be permitted for a flexible approach to making single employer determinations.

The amendment that I am offering would bring the language of section 2(a) in line with the description of that language contained in the committee report. A weighing of all the relevant circumstances would be permitted under my amendment. The very type of weighing that is contemplated in the D.C. circuit's Kiewit decision and the National Labor Relations Board would be given the flexibility that the sponsors want to be a part of H.R. 281.

To accomplish that end, the amendment directly incorporates key phrases from the committee report and from the Kiewit decision, sided with the approval in the committee report.

Adoption of the amendment will provide labor employees and management with a more consistent statement of the intent of section 2(a).

Does this make the bill perfect? No; it does not. It does at least make the bill do what the sponsors say they want it to do, and I would refer the House to page 5 of the committee report where they cite the Kiewit decision:

That court concluded that the proper test is whether there is "a substantial qualitative degree of interrelation of operations and common management—one that—would not be found in the arm's length relationship existing among unintegrated companies."

The committee bill, as amended, speaks nothing of that, but would say that if there is common ownership, substantial ownership, then those two companies can, even with an arm's length, nevertheless, would be deemed a single employer.

The committee report goes on to say on page 7 that the bill provides that several factors such as common ownership, common management and common control—I remind the House that the committee bill speaks of every one of those factors—are to be viewed in the aggregate to determine single employer status and with the totality of the relevant circumstances show that the relationship between two or more companies is not an arm's length one; the single factor of common control of day-to-day labor relations is to be given weight.

The difference between this amendment and the committee bill, as amended, is this: This amendment would say that so long as those subsidiaries are at arm's length, independent companies, then they can operate in two different marketplaces and the employees can choose which one to work for.

□ 1445

The committee bill says no, that so long as the company has substantial common ownership it cannot operate two independent arms's-length companies as current law now provides and as the sponsors of the bill seem to have supported in the committee report.

So I urge adoption of this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is a codification of the existing standard applied by the NLRB to determine single employer status. And as experience has demonstrated, this standard is not sufficient to close the loopholes that permit employers to walk away from their contractual obligations. If the board had propely performed its duties in the first instance, this legislation would not be necessary.

Instead, the Board using the very standard we are being asked to adopt by the gentleman, has sanctioned the ability of an emloyer to unilaterally walk away from its commitments to workers. In the Kiewit case that the gentleman referred to, it was stipulated on the record that the Kiewit Co. was subject to a collective bargaining agreement and that it brought in a wholly owned, nonunion subsidiary for the express purpose of avoiding the requirements of the agreement.

There no question of common ownership or control. Despite this, the NLRB found that since the day-to-day labor relations of each company were handled separately, the contract did not apply.

Now the amendment before us does not ensure that the Board or the courts will make their determination of single employer status on the basis of all relevant facts. Rather, it permits the Board to apply the same reasoning it used previously. By so doing, it recreates a means by which employers will continue to escape the obligations of their agreements.

As I have stated in committee, in the report and on the floor, section 2(a) is intended to apply only to related businesses and not to truly independent businesses.

If the gentleman remains concerned that section 2(a) as reported may still apply too broadly, then I say to the gentleman that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AUCOIN], should have addressed that concern. H.R. 281 is not intended and will not result in truly independent businesses being deemed to be single employers.

The amendment that is before us, however, poses the very real likelihood of undoing all this legislation seeks to accomplish by insuring the ability of employers to unilaterally abrogate collective bargaining agreements.

Mr. Chairman, I urge that the amendment be defeated.

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted we are actually worse off than under existing law in the effort to try to deal with what I feel is the pernicious practice of double breasting, of allowing an employer to unilaterally abrogate a collective bargaining agreement by settling up a shell operation. If you examine the language of the amendment, two operations which have absolutely identical common ownership, common management and control but are not found to have a substantial qualitative degree of interelationship of operations because the common ownership has decided, looking at this amendment, that that is the way they avoid coming within the scope of this amendment, those are not found to be a single employer.

We are worse off than under existing law where at least the National Labor Relations Board and the courts in interpreting them can on a case-by-case basis look at the situation and all the facts surrounding it and determine whether in fact an effort to avoid the obligations of section 8f of the National Labor Relations Act are being complied with.

The amendment adopted earlier, by Mr. AUCOIN, deals with the problem of some identity of management or ownership which is not intended to be and is not in reality a double breasting situation.

This amendment adds a level of a test that provides simply a blueprint for the construction employer who wants to get out of a contract that he has signed before the term of that contract has expired; it just shows him the way.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AUCOIN].

Mr. AUCOIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman from Texas seems to make a new definition of what a single employer is. Under the amendment that the Committee of the Whole just adopted we have accomplished the definition that mets many of the objections and concerns of the gentleman from Texas.

Under the terms of that adopted amendment, a substantial degree of common ownership would have to be in place before any two business entities could be considered a single entity. No two separate entities would be bound by an agreement signed by one if their only connection was some small degree of common ownership. So I think that the Committee has worked its will, it has defined what a single employer ought to be. It is not painted, this definition, with a large brush. It has been very refined. It has made clear what we intend.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding, and I urge defeat of the Bartlett amendment.

Mr. BERMAN. I thank the gentleman for his comments. I agree with them completely. I only want to reiterate, under the gentleman's amendment, if it is adopted, you can have an absolute, complete and total common ownership, management and control, but if they have organized their operations to not have the substantial qualitative degree of interrelationship, which will be obviously their incentive to do under this provision, they are not a single employer.

So any of the criticisms of any other amendment that has been offered and accepted to this bill are not met by this amendment. This goes far beyond that.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERMAN. If I still have time, I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman is saying what is in the committee report and I think what should be in the law. The only difficulty is the committee bill, even as amended, does not say that. The committee bill does not provide for, as the gentleman has stated, for several factors with an interrelationship. The committee bill as amended says you are a single employer if you are having directly or indirectly substantial common ownership, common management or common control. So if you do not have common ownership but you have common management, then therefore you are a single employer. If you are owned by two different companies but you have some common mangement, you are a single company, single employer.

Could the gentleman reconcile what he is saying and what the bill says?

Mr. BERMAN. Under the amendment that the gentleman from Texas is offering if company A, with owners and management, dissolves even though they are obilgated for several more years a under a collective bargaining agreement, and company B, same ownership, same managment, takes over those operations, where is the substantial qualitative degree of interrelationship with the company that is dissolved and a company that is now starting operations? The gentleman is adding a test that I think goes far beyond his criticisms of the language of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. BERMAN] has expired.

(On request of Mr. BARTLETT and by unanimous consent, Mr. BERMAN was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman continue to yield?

Mr. BERMAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman for yielding further.

What this amendment says, and it says it directly, is that upon viewing the totality of the circumstances in the aggregate, have a substantial qualitative degree of interrelationship of operations and common ownership, management or control. This amendment says what the gentleman is saying. But as I understand the gentleman, and I respect him a great deal, he is knowledgeable in these areas. But the difficulty is, what the gentleman is saying is not what would result from the bill as it is currently drafted.

Mr. BERMAN. Not to beat this horse too much, if I may reclaim my time, but if the gentleman could answer one question: The NLRB or the circuit court reviewing an NLRB decision in this area, looking at the totality of the relevant circumstances, how could they possibly find that a company that has gone out of existence but has the exact same ownership and management as a company that has sprung up in order to avoid a collective bargaining contract, has a substantial qualitative degree of interrelationship of operations?

They cannot find it because a company that is no longer in existence has no interrelationship with the new company. Perhaps unintentionally the gentleman has drafted an amendment that I think creates an impossible situation and is truly worse than the existing laws in this area.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. BERMAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. I suppose what I am saying is, if under current law or under my amendment, if a company shifted all of its control and all of its contracts over to another company simply to avoid, as an alter ego, to avoid its legitimate prehire agreement, that is already illegal, and we do not need a bill to solve that. My amendment continues that, that would be illegal. The committee bill, unamended, goes far beyond that and says that if a company has two independent subsidiaries at arm's length, it is, necessarily, nevertheless a single employer even though they are two completely separate entities, separate employees, separate management, separate contracts, but it would be deemed under labor law, but under no other law, under labor law to be a single employer.

My only purpose in offering this amendment is that the committee report says it should not be, current law says it should not be, the employees do not want it, only the sponsors of this legislation would want it to be.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BERMAN. I appreciate the comments of the gentleman.

I would just suggest that an examination of this language would indicate an effort to go far beyond the criticisms the gentleman has of the existing bill.

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

This amendment should certainly be acceptable to the committee which reported H.R. 281, because it does no more than reconcile the rather vague and very broad language of one portion of the bill with what the authors have said they intended in the committee report.

I am referring, of course, to the provision that defines what constitutes a "single employer."

By its own terms, the bill would have the NLRB and the courts find single ownership when there is "any direct or indirect common ownership, management or control." I particularly note with concern the words "any"—which does not seem to establish any quantitative standard—and "indirect"—which leaves uncertain just how far apart two firms really have to be before they are considered separate businesses.

The amendment solves this significant problem by simply replacing the bill's overbroad definition with one right out of the committee report, one that very much reflects the commonsense approach that has developed under a good deal of case law.

Mr. Chairman, I have always believed it is the best policy not to explain what you mean to say but to simply say what you mean. That is the simple, but substantial, improvement the Bartlett amendment makes in this bill.

I support it and I hope everyone else will, too.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Campbell for, with Mr. Ford of Tennessee against.

Mr. BOLAND and Mr. THOMAS of Georgia changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

Mr. KASICH and Mr. WHITTEN changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. SABO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. SABO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments.

Labor-management relations in the construction industry are unique. Work sites shift, manpower requirements are continually in flux, and much of the labor force is transient. Contractors often do not hire a full complement of workers until their bid is accepted. Certifying a union is a long process. If traditional union election procedures were required for the construction industry, the work might well be completed before the election.

Congress recognized the unique nature of the construction industry when, in 1959, it added section 8(f) to the National Labor Relations Act. That important amendment permits contractors and unions in the construction industry to enter into prehire agreements wherein the contractor agrees to hire at the union hall at agreed wages and benefits and the union agrees to make skilled workers available. There is no obligation for either the contractor or the union to sign prehire agreements and workers have the right to decertify the union once work is under way.

Unfortunately, a recent line of National Labor Relations Board and court decisions have eroded the effect of prehire agreements. The Board and court decisions have given contractors two avenues to avoid the bargaining agreement. First, they can ignore the agreement when beginning a new project—even if the agreement is for a term of years—unless the union can prove that a majority of the contractor's stable work force or a majority of workers on each job site support the union. Shifting work sites and changing work forces make that difficult.

The other option available to contractors is double breasting. There, the contractor sets up a second, nonunion company which performs the same type of work in the same area under basically the same management and control. The effect is to defeat the terms of existing prehire agreements.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 281 does not impose an unfair burden on the contractor. It does not expand the law passed 27 years ago—it only restores the intent of that law. Under this bill, prehire agreements would have the same binding effect as other collective-bargaining agreements for the period specified in the agreement. Workers would still be entitled to decertify the union. The bill also provides that related business entities in the construction industry under common control and performing the same or similar work would be considered a single employer for the purposes of labor law and would cover all operations of that employer within the geographic area specified in the agreement. It does not impose collective-bargaining agreements on companies that are truly independent.

This legislation is fair and reasonable and, once again, reasserts congressional intent. I believe that it deserves support.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I had originally intended to offer a substitute to this bill. But I have taken note of the vote on the last amendment, which I believe was a good amendment, because it would merely have clarified what the majority and the authors of this bill said they intended to do. It is obvious that I would be less than likely to succeed in an attempt to get an amendment which would take care of an even more egregious part of the bill dealing with appropriate bargaining units. Thus, I will not ask Members on this very divisive and difficult issue to again vote on something which I know will not prevail.

I would just point out that we do have some very difficult amendments, on philosophic issues, which we must deal with; and, therefore, I will not take the time of the committee to deal with the substitute, which I believe would have been excellent help and assistance to the people who desire to pass this legislation.

Meanwhile, unlike H.R. 281, my substitute would also have retained an additional protection under current law for the workers: For the collective bargaining agreement to apply to both companies, the NLRB would have to determine that the workers of the two companies have a "community of interests." This requirement applies to all collective-bargaining agreements in all industries and is based upon the fundamental premise that workers with different needs should not be bound together under collective-bargaining agreements.

In addition, my amendment would have strengthened the union's hand at the bargaining table by specifically permitting antidouble breasting clauses in collective bargaining agreements in the construction industry. Some agreements in the industry already include such clauses, but they are currently being challenged by the National Labor Relations Board as constituting unlawful activity against separate employers. In my view, if we are to retain the current definition of "single employer," we should at least give the unions the tools they need to acquire additional protection at the bargaining table.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BARTLETT

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARTLETT: Page 3, line 20, after the word "shall" insert a comma and the following new language: "upon ratification by a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit covered by the agreement (in a secret ballot election conducted under section 9(c)),".

□ 1525

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment is the key amendment to the bill. It is one that goes to the heart of the unfairness that is in the current bill.

This amendment, entitled "Secret Ballot Amendment," preserves the free choice of employees who have not been given the opportunity to decide if they want to be bound by the terms of a union contract, including paying union dues and having to work by union work rules. It guarantees the right of these employees to vote by secret-ballot election, on whether or not they want to be represented by a labor union before they are automatically subject to the terms of a union agreement that was negotiated without their knowledge or without their consent or without their participation.

Mr. Chairman, under H.R. 281, the difficulty with the bill is that the union contract of a single employer would be automatically—automatically—applied to any nonunion entity of that employer if, under the definition we have previously adopted, the entity has any operations within the same geographical area.

It does not matter if the employees of the nonunion operation are perfectly happy with their current jobs and wages, and prefer to be working open shop. H.R. 281 arbitrarily requires that the collective-bargaining agreement of the unionized contractor would be extended to those nonunion employees. In other words, employees who may have willingly worked for years in a nonunion setting are going to suddenly find themselves bound by a union contract, and may have to pay dues to a union which they never got a chance to vote on.

This bill without this amendment would turn on its head the fundamental tenet of freedom of choice, which has been part of our national labor law since 1935. Instead of giving these employees the right to decide on whether or not they want to be represented by a union before they have to pay union dues and work according to the work rules and abide by the terms and conditions, the bill instead says that they must go through complicated NLRB procedures, so the employees themselves would have to go through a decertification process to repudiate the union contract after the fact. In so many words, they are being told without this amendment that they are going to work union, and if they do not like it, too bad; they will just have to quit.

Furthermore, if the contract has a union-security clause, the employees will have to pay union dues and abide by work conditions set by the union or they will lose their job with no right of appeal.

My amendment does not alter the basic purpose of H.R. 281. I think we have resolved that in the definition of "single employer." It will not prevent a union contract from being extended to all operations of a dual-shop employer. I wish it did, I wish it could, but the House has worked its will. It simply says that before the contract goes into effect on the employees of a company who have chosen to work nonunion, that they will have the opportunity through an NLRB-supervised secret-ballot election to decide whether they want to be represented by the union.

Mr. Chairman, we have in current law in section 9(c) of labor law a whole body of law regarding the conduct of secret-ballot elections. We also provide that the NLRB could set new rules and regulations for the conduct of elections within the context of a prehire agreement. This would be one election one time. It would not provide for a project-by-project or site-by-site kind of election. It merely says that the employees of that open shop would be given one opportunity to cast a vote. It does not preclude those employees from later coming back, if they vote no, indicating majority support and joining either that union or another union at a later time.

There is some comment that I have heard over the last 6 months that this—frankly, as we have tried different drafts to get to the purpose—somehow is not a perfect draft. I would suggest that the bill is so flawed, that the bill is so imperfect, that this draft is a perfect draft in the sense that it restores a fundamental right of employees to vote on whether or not they want to belong to a union and abide by the terms and conditions of a union contract.

H.R. 281 without this amendment takes that right away. Make no mistake about it—this vote will be purely a vote for democracy in unions. I understand that is what they want. I understand that is the goal. It merely says that, without regard to everything else, the employees themselves have a choice.

Amendments had previously been opposed by some organizations—the Department of Labor, the AGC, and others. I would report to the House that today, as of now, those organizations are supporting this amendment as a way to restore some degree of democracy and some degree of rights to employees from the results of an unfair bill.

I urge my colleagues to think fairness, to think about being fair to those individual men and women who are doing the work, who are paying the dues, and who are in the contracting and construction business and who are building this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] has expired.

(On request of Mr. ROEMER, and by unanimous consent, Mr. BARTLETT was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute).

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I did not support the past amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and I am questioning this one. If the gentleman would yield to me for that purpose, I would ask a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ROEMER. What is the current law? Is the gentleman correcting a wrong in the current law with this amendment, or does the bill address this issue at all?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his question.

The current law does not have an ill in it. The ill is created by the bill. So my amendment is related only to the difficulties that the bill would provide. The current law says that if you belong to a company and you indicate majority support, then you can get an election, or then you can have, with majority support, that union contract negotiated on your behalf.

This bill would turn that on its head and say that the employees of the previously open shop would have none of those rights. That would just restore current law, the rights to a vote.

Mr. ROEMER. If the gentleman would yield further, if you are employed and are nonunion under current law, and you would like to have an election to join a union, can you do that immediately?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] has expired.

(On request of Mr. ROEMER, and by unanimous consent, Mr. BARTLETT was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, first let me say that yes, under current law if you are an employee and you want to organize or show some majority support to create a union, you can do that. My amendment would not affect that. You still could do that.

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further on that point?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. BERMAN].

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] has inadvertently but inaccurately stated the situation. Current law has section 8(f) and other sections of the National Labor Relations Act which in the construction industry authorize prehiring collective-bargaining contracts between the employer and the union without that kind of an election. The gentleman's amendment seeks to fundamentally change the structure of existing law, and later on in the course of the debate on this amendment I will speak to it. There is a germ of logic in what the gentleman is saying. Unfortunately I do not think this amendment deals with the problem in anywhere near a correct fashion.

I think the question of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROEMER] is still before the House. This issue that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] is seeking to address is a problem that he has with existing law on collective bargaining and elections in the construction area; it is not a problem that the bill is creating.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] has expired.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment would require a secret ballot vote for the selection of a bargaining representative. It goes well beyond the scope of H.R. 281, which addresses two narrow and specific problems with the current interpretation of the National Labor Relations Act as it applies to the construction industry to alter current practices of voluntary recognition in all industries. The amendment is totally unwarranted and deserves defeat.

Under the current law, as it applies outside the construction industry, unions can achieve the status of collective-bargaining representative in one of two ways: Either the employer recognizes the union as the representative of the majority of its employees or the union wins an election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board. This amendment would eliminate the first method. The amendment's sponsors have made no showing, nor could they, that employer recognition based on evidence of majority support is not a legitimate means for unions to achieve the status of bargaining representative. In fact, given all of the union-busting consultants and coercion which unscrupulous employees now use in NLRB election campaigns, a check of authorization cards may well result in a more accurate reflection of employee sentiment than the totals in a Board-run election. To do away with voluntary recognition would place an enormous administrative burden on the NLRB, as now all organizing campaigns would result in Board elections. It would also severely limit unions in their ability to organize and represent employees.

Certainly, in the construction industry, requiring representation elections is the surest way to assure that employees will never receive the benefits of union representation. Because of the peculiar nature of the construction industry, with jobs of short duration and employees working for many different employers, representation elections simply aren't feasible. This amendment would do away with prehire agreements completely and effectively preclude workers in the construction industry from ever being represented by a union.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

I think the gentleman is making an important point. On the surface the gentleman's amendment seems reasonable, but if Members will take just a moment to think about the nature of the construction industry and the workers who find their livelihood there, they will stop and pause and realize that imposing an election in each one of these cases for certification would mean that you would have an election process at each construction project and the practical effect of that by eliminating prehire agreements would be that an election would have to be held and the project would probably be completed before the election could be held; so that is even worse than current law. It imposes an industrial union model standard on the construction industry. I think history has shown that is simply inappropriate for the particular nature of the construction industry. Would the gentleman agree with that.

Mr. CLAY. I certainly agree with it. In fact, the history of representation elections now shows that some of them can take as long as 5 years to be completed. These projects usually average between 3 months and 6 months. You would never have an election within that time frame in order to determine who has a majority of the workers.

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAY. Yes; I certainly will.

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think both the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Oregon have put their finger on it; but I think the problem is much worse than has even been illustrated up to now.

Under existing labor law and if this amendment would apply this process to the construction industry, your typical scenario is that the employees, a majority of whom seek to be represented for purposes of collective bargaining, file a petition. The employer then has the right to challenge the bargaining unit that that election is supposed to take place in.

There is then an NLRB examiner's hearing on the issue of what is the appropriate bargaining unit, with evidence presented on both sides and hearings that have gone on for months and months in many cases, but certainly for at least a week. A transcript is printed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

(At the request of Mr. BARTLETT, and by unanimous consent, Mr. CLAY was allowed to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.)

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. BERMAN].

Mr. BERMAN. After the hearing, briefs are filed. They go before the National Labor Relations Board. The Board considers them, makes a ruling on the appropriate bargaining unit, which the employer, if he does not like the result, or the union, can seek to have a review in the circuit court of appeals for the appropriate district, either the District of Columbia or the area of the construction site, and then with potential appeal to the Supreme Court. That is only one part of the problem.

You are now down the road a number of months and years from the time the petition is filed.

After the election, either party can file objections to who is voting, claiming that person was not entitled, was not a member of the bargaining unit, was not an employee at the appropriate time, and the objections to certain ballots are also litigated in a manner somewhat similar to the one for the bargaining unit.

Even at that point, either side can file unfair labor practices. First a charge is filed. The Board investigates. Their agent in that particular area investigates. Then a complaint, then litigation.

The problem, the fundamental problem of the National Labor Relations Act right now is the procedural obstacles thwart the will of the employees. To impose this on a seasonal industry of transitory nature with many different sites without protections for quick elections, for immediate certifications of the employees to vote that way or insuring that bargaining rights will be observed, ends up making a greater mockery of the process than the problem the gentleman is seeking to correct.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the gentlewoman.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to express my agreement with what the chairman of the committee has said.

I reluctantly must disagree with my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Texas, and let me tell you why. As this body knows, I am against this bill, but I am not intent on destroying the fundamental purpose of prehire agreements, which I am afraid would be the consequence of this well-intended, but I think ill-advised amendment.

I tussled with this problem of prehire agreements and the choice question myself in trying to devise a substitute. As you know, in the committee we tried to work on that.

We must not forget the history of prehire agreements and the fact that in the 1950's secret ballots did not work because of the peculiar and unique nature of the industry which made it necessary to permit prehire agreements under section 8(f). That is why we have section 8(f).

Now, to propose a secret ballot would destroy prehire agreements, literally destroy them. There are other ways, I might say to the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROUKEMA. No, I will yield in a moment, but I must get this point across.

There are other ways to show majority support and give employees a choice that do not involve secret ballots.

So if our concern is for employee choice, there are many ways recognized under existing case law and under NLRB decisions to do that. I will not go into that and take the time for it now, but believe me, there are at least three or four other ways that are feasible. Secret ballots are not feasible because of the length of time. They would literally destroy prehire agreements.

Now, there is a second reason why I cannot support my friend, the gentleman from Texas, and that is the whole question of mixing the choice of the bargaining unit with that of the negotiated contract.

Under the words of the gentleman's amendment, the two are confused. The gentleman makes almost synonymous the vote on majority support for the union with majority support for the contract. I suggest that that cannot be done. It should not be done. It is an administrative nightmare and it is totally impractical.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I respect the gentlewoman from New Jersey a great deal and the gentleman from Missouri, but I would just ask them to reread the amendment. The fact is what they have said all along is that they are in favor of showing majority support, but they do not want under this bill for the employees of an open shop to be able to demonstrate majority support, because they have not provided any procedure for majority support indications for those employees who would have the terms and conditions of a prehire agreement applied to them.

I would suggest that the secret ballot election, one ballot, one time, is the best way to demonstrate that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. BARTLETT, and by unanimous consent, Mr. CLAY was allowed to proceed for an additional 2 minutes.)

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentlewoman from New Jersey or the gentleman from Missouri would offer one of those attempts to allow majority support or any indication of that employee to have any voice at all in the process, than I would support it; but it is not in the bill and it is not in any of the amendments that have been proposed, except this one. This one says very clearly, and I just invite the Members to reread it, that the application of those terms and conditions, the union terms and conditions, only applies upon the ratification by a majority of the employees in the bargaining agreement. That is all it says.

It allows the NLRB to set up an election. An uncontested election in fact generally takes less than 30 days.

Is it a site-by-site election, as the gentleman from Oregon suggested? No, it is not. It is one election. It is one opportunity for the employees to indicate their will. In fact, other procedures allow those employees if they vote down a union one time, they can come back under the regular procedures. This would be a simple election, one election, that would be mandated by law.

Mr. CLAY. Let me reclaim my time. Mr. Chairman, just to answer briefly.

There is no need for us to put any stipulations into this, because existing law provides a mechanism for union members to decertify that union, so it would be redundant for us to put it back into this bill that we are now passing.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, I will.

Mr. BARTLETT. I agree that current law does provide for an indication of majority support, but H.R. 281 takes away that provision of majority support and would say that on day one the open shop employees would be bound by the terms and conditions of a prehire agreement that someone else negotiated.

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

I guess I would like to make an announcement before I begin. I am a junior member of the committee and given the protocol and conventions of the House, the junior members of the committee must wait and then, of course, noncommittee members wait longer. That being the case and my having demonstrated all this patience, I will ask, please do not ask me to yield until I have given the statement that I have waited so long to give.

I want to make that point because I want to also recognize that there is something in the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] that goes beyond the letter of the law, and that is the fact that all of our businesses are conducted not only within the terms of the letter of law, but in terms of the conventions and the practices of the environment in which we carry that out.

Now, I cannot help but also observe, you know, we live in a culture that has held out the hope for hundreds of years now that someday the lion will lay down with the lamb. I suppose we might get some very real evidence that that day is soon to be here when we find that the union member may be willing to go to work on the same site as the nonunion worker. I do not understand why that is so difficult. I have done that. I have worked right along side nonunion workers. We managed to get along fine; but that is so much a part of the problem.

Let me go to the issue that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] is addressing here. Because of the nature of the business, the seasonal nature of it and the shortness of duration of many of the jobs, we cannot go through the normal process of certifying a union. The elections take too long and it is because of that that we developed the prehire arrangement.

Frankly, it has worked pretty well. The construction industry in America has done very well over the past 20 years. Construction workers have done very well, but within the context of this and given the geographic locations we move to and from, the different conventions in those different locations, the different natures of work forces, we have found in this industry that it has worked very well for those workers who chose not to be union members. There has been a decline in membership. It has not worked well for the union and its membership and I really fear that that is the big reason we have this impetus for this legislation. One reason I fear that is because I read about it in an AFL-CIO publication.

Certainly every organization wants to build its clientele and its constituency. We should not expect the union organizations to be any different; but looking then at this process, what we find here is a piece of legislation that would make the prehire agreement binding on those employees of the part of the firm or the firm or whatever that made the agreement; but then also binding on employees in another operation that is nonunion where the workers are happy to abide by them.

Now, what we find happening, given the condition that we could not go through the normal certification because of the nature of the employment, we provide for their right, the workers' right to express their will through the opportunity for a decertification election; that is to say, once we have got the unionization status, we are now saying that if there is time within the context of this contract, you can decertify that.

□ 1550

If this is not time to certify, there is not time to decertify. That is part of the problem. But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] is saying that workers in a plant in a community 30 miles away from those in a plant or on a job site that have negotiated and accepted the prehire agreement should not be bound by that without some opportunity to express their fundamental right.

It is an absolutely, totally accepted tenet of a democratic system that the people living under the jurisdiction of that system have the right to an election with a secret ballot. It is hard for me to imagine that anybody would want to deny anyone of the right to do that.

How much of the debate that we have had with respect to foreign policy has been centered around whether or not this country should deal in questions of the right of people to have free elections with secret ballots in other parts of the world, and yet we are talking about people here, with respect to that dimension of their lives that is so near and dear to their ability to provide.

I might also point out that part of the problem is complicated because of the question of free riders, and there is a question. Is it fair for the union to be compelled to exclusive representation, to give that representation to members who do not pay dues or join the union? I say no, it is not fair, and I would like to make a point at this time, for anybody here willing to join with me. I am perfectly willing to take legislation into this body that relieves that unfair burden of exclusive representation from the union. They should not be required to represent workers who do not pay dues.

The worker who decides he does not want to, declines membership, does not pay the dues, should not be required to live under the burden of the representation he said he did not want.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

I will take less than 5 minutes. I want to thank my colleague, the gentleman from Texas, for helping me there with the parliamentary procedure. Unlike him, however, I do not think I will yield at all because I want to get this over with.

First of all, I want to make a couple of points that are not technical in nature but have to do with general philosophy. I would also like to say to the gentlewoman from New Jersey, in her reference to the gentleman from Dallas, that he may be well intentioned but he is never ill-advised. He knows exactly what he is doing, and he always does, and he does it very well.

Everyone in here knows that his amendment is an amendment that basically is a union-busting amendment; that it provides for elections on construction sites that simply will not work; that we cannot apply the industrial norm to the construction norm. I think that is very important and I am firmly convinced that my good colleague from Dallas knows that exactly.

Finally, I would like to say that in relation to what was just said by my other colleague from north Texas, we do live in a multicultured society. One of the things that holds our society together is that we share power in this society. Everybody has something to say about the society.

During the last few years, I believe that the balance of power has shifted dramatically away from those who represent organized workers. I do not believe that is necessarily a healthy thing. I think this would be a trend ever further in that direction, which I do not think would be healthy for the United States.

I would like to remind all of my colleagues that in the United States we have only substantial trade union movement in the world that is not Socialist or worse, and I think we should try to keep it that way.

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT], and I am indeed considerably puzzled by particularly the last statement of my friend, the gentleman from Texas.

I would call the attention of each of my colleagues to the bill, page 3, starting at line 6 through line 14, and I would appreciate the chairman or any member of the committee to educate me if what I am about to say is wrong, because I believe by colleague from Texas was totally wrong in his interpretation to this House of what this bill says. If I am wrong, I want somebody to prove it to this House right now.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment, I believe, addresses one of the most glaring flaws in H.R. 281, that of depriving the workers in shop A of any say in whether they are represented and by whom, just because shop B is a union shop and there is some vague, tenuous relation between the two.

The Bartlett amendment reaffirms a central tenet of our labor laws; namely, that union representation should always be based on the consent of the majority of workers being represented. Simple fairness demands that the workers at shop A should not be subject to a given employment contract simply because another group of workers, somewhere, voted for that contract.

Besides protecting the right of workers to vote on the issues most intimately affecting their jobs and livelihood, this amendment includes the additional safeguard that any such vote is fully supervised by the NLRB.

A fundamental principle of our form of government has always been that the right to govern is derived from the consent of the people. This amendment simply continues the venerable tradition of applying that same principle to those who represent and negotiate for their fellow employees.

I urge adoption of the amendment.

This is not a "gutting" amendment, as my colleague from Texas said. Let us read the law in case we have not stopped to look at it:

> Whenever the collective bargaining involves employees of a business entity comprising part of a single employer in the construction, as defined in section 2(2) of this Act, the duty to bargain collectively, for the purposes of this section, shall include the duty to apply the terms of a collective bargaining agreement between such business entity and a labor organization to all other business entities comprising the single employer within the geographical area covered by the agreement.

That is very clear. That is why the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is very clear. We should not have shop A superseding or passing on their union contract to shop B without allowing the workers in shop B to vote. That is all this amendment says, and I urge the Members to read and not be deceived.

I am reminded of the late Will Rogers famous quote, and I think it is very apropos at this time:

> It ain't people's ignorance that bothers me so much. It's them knowing so much that ain't so is the problem.

I think we are arguing about some things here that just are not so. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is trying to collect it in saying if this bill passes, if it passes in its current form, and if double breasting is in fact outlawed, then at least let those employees who will be covered have a vote in deciding the form and shape of that contract that will affect them. That is all it does.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 123, noes 286, not voting 24, as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Iowa changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

Messrs. McCANDLESS, ROTH, HUCKABY, and SOLOMON changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 281, the construction industry labor law amendments.

American labor laws are designed to give workers the right to join a union and engage in collective bargaining when they want to. But because of the mushrooming practice of double breasting, workers in the building trades are being denied this fundamental right.

U.S. law has long recognized the unique position of workers in the construction industry by permitting prehire agreements—agreements which are entered into before an employer has hired all of its employees. Prehire agreements are necessary because the construction industry is characterized by constantly shifting worksites and a fluctuating level of employment.

The approval of prehire agreements made the basic right of union representation available to a group of employees who otherwise would not be able to share in its benefits.

It worked well—until recent decisions by the National Labor Relations Board began to undermine the law. The NLRB has held that employers may repudiate prehire agreements unless the union can demonstrate majority support at every worksite. The NLRB has also held that employers may avoid their prehire agreements by setting up a related company which is nonunion to accomplish the same work.

The result has been the birth of double breasting, which is nothing less than a modern and legal method of busting the union.

H.R. 281 is a simple measure to reassert the fundamental rights of workers in the building trades to union representation. The bill would accomplish three essential tasks. It stipulates that businesses with direct or indirect common ownership, management, or control will be treated as a single employer. It mandates that when an employer has a collective-bargaining agreement, that agreement will apply to all business entities that make up that single employer within the geographical area covered by the agreement. And it reestablishes the legality of prehire agreements between unions and management unless a majority of employees in the union elect another representative or choose not to be represented.

It is apparent that unions are under attack in this country from an administration that is openly hostile and from employers who are willing to use scurrilous tactics to undermine union activities. But it is difficult to imagine that the House of Representatives—the people's body—would stand idly by while an entire group of workers is denied the fundamental right of bargaining in good faith with their employers.

H.R. 281 will right this wrong. It is fair, it is simple, and it is just. I urge all my colleagues to join in approving this bill intact and without weakening amendments.

SUBCOMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION ON REVENUE SHARING—ANNOUNCEMENT OF DEATH OF THE LATE HONORABLE ROBERT R. (BOB) CASEY

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BROOKS was allowed to speak out of order.)

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I have two news items, both of which are bad.

First, Mr. Chairman, I have taken this time to advise the Members of the House of the status of one of our more controversial programs; general revenue sharing. As the Members know, the administration has recommended the elimination of this budget busting program when it expires this year. On the contrary, the Intergovernmental Relations and Human Resources Subcommittee of the Government Operations Committee has recommended that it be extended for an additional 3 years at its current level. They have agreed, however, to make it subject to appropriations rather than to continue the present entitlement status it now enjoys.

I, of course, am continuing the opposition I have had to this program since it was first enacted in 1972, but I want the Members to know that I have scheduled the bill for full committee action next Tuesday, April 22. I want you to be prepared for the barrage of lobbying activity you can probably expect to be generated by this announcement.

The second item of bad news is that our distinguished and beloved colleague, Bob Casey, who represented the 22d District in Houston has passed away. Many of you knew him and recall his wife, Hazel. He served here from 1959 to 1976 and was primarily on the Committee on Appropriations. Services will be held at the First Christian Church in Houston at 10:30 a.m. next Monday, and interment will be in Houston.

I wanted the House to know this, and I regret that I have to bring the Members that information.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WALKER

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALKER: On Page 4, after line 7, insert the following new section:

SEC. 2(d). It is the sense of the Congress that, under the requirements set forth in this bill, violence and coercion are inimicable to the collective bargaining process and that employers and labor organizations in the building and construction industry in fulfilling the objectives of this bill should never use or condone the use of violence.

Mr. WALKER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment deals with a real problem in a very modest way. It simply says that we believe that violence in the construction industry by either employers or unions is wrong and could never be condoned. One wishes that such a statement were not even necessary, but violence in this industry is an appalling reality, it has led to serious injuries and even deaths.

I urge the adoption of the amendment, and I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY].

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, in accepting this amendment the Committee does so with the understanding that the amendment is intended to express our sense and in no way is intended to substantively amend either the National Labor Relations Act or any other statute. We recognize that a pervasive structure of State and Federal law presently regulates this area and that any modification of that structure should only be undertaken with great care and thorough deliberation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on all remaining amendments be limited to 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY]?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will divide the time, 10 minutes to be apportioned by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY] and 10 minutes to be apportioned by the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA].

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ARMEY

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ARMEY: Page 3, line 14, strike out "the agreement." and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the agreement, except that an agreement between an employer and a labor organization which would require compulsory employee support of a labor organization (including the irrevocable authorization of dues or fees to be withheld from wages and paid to a labor organization) shall be applicable only to the employees of the business entity which is the formal party to such agreement and not to the employees of any other business entity comprising such single employer.".

Mr. ARMEY (during the reading.) Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas, a member of the committee.

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Chairman, I think it is fairly clear that prudence will dictate that I be brief at this point. It seems to me the will of the House is fairly evident. But I would like to discuss this amendment.

One of the things that I have been talking about today and indeed what everybody in this room has been talking about today has been the fundamental rights of the American working man and working woman. There seems to be, I think, a very clear and uniform devotion and concern by all parties regarding those rights. We have different ideas as to where the rights are best found, under what procedures, and so forth. I disagree with this legislation.

I feel as though it responds too much to the rights of the labor leaders and not enough to the rights and the preferences of the workers. There are many problems I have with the legislation. The biggest problem I have is the danger it poses to that worker in America who would have an honest preference and desire to not be a member of a union, to not be represented by a union. That is understandable to me, Mr. Chairman. I have worked on construction and I had good reasons for not wanting to be a member of a union.

I had good reasons to prefer not to have union membership. Certainly some of them just put down as a cussed orneriness, independent cuss, that is my nature. But there were practical reasons, too.

One, for example, was the safety rules of the union. I honestly believed that I was safer using my own judgment in all the circumstances one encounters out there in the field of work than I would if I abided by the strict rules of safety. One of the things that I experienced though, and I always enjoy remembering this, is that those members of my crew who preferred membership worked right alongside us, those of us who did not. We really had no problem. I was never called a scab, I was never insulted. We worked together. Sometimes they sat down for coffee and I kept right on working. They did call me a company man a time or two, but it was all in good kidding. I regret the fact that that cannot continue in the world of work today.

I have to tell you quite frankly I believe that one of the big reasons it cannot is the militant nature of many of our union leaders. I do not think that is found in the hearts of the workers. We have had a good debate here today. I think there has been fairness and respect on both sides of this issue. Only once did we find any harsh language. I recall the word unscrupulous being raised. Yes, we do have a problem sometimes of unscrupulous behavior by employers, and the National Labor Relations Board does respond. We do have provisions to respond to double breasting sham tactics. There is no agreement that the response has been adequate, but the response is there. I still believe the law is not necessary.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, as I go back to the point I made earlier about the difference between the law and practices and conventions, there are practices on both sides of employment, both by the employer and by the union and "unscrupulous" may unfortunately be a word by which we could describe that.

When we move to this question of forced compulsory unionism, we take away the choice of the individual worker. In two regards: One, he may be mandated to associate with a union that he does not want to make an association with and, two, there is a certain abridgment by the practices of unions, of his freedom of expression.

I had a union worker talk to me in 1984, and he said that he was a devote supporter of President Reagan and he resented that part of his union dues went into a fund that supported the opposition point of view. He should not have had that trespass against his freedom of expression. He should not have been required by the membership to subscribe to that funding of the alternative point of view. He should have had the right to choose to disavow his membership and to continue working there, side by side with those who chose to stay. I do not think that is too much to ask in a common, civilized, democratic community like ours.

Why must the right of the person who prefers to be an independent agent be taken away?

My amendment asks for a redefinition of the language so that the union agreement, the prehire agreement will be binding only on those parties that sign the agreement so that workers in another work location who have not been a party to that agreement will not be brought under that agreement unless they should choose to do so.

I do this in regard to the rights of workers to be their own free, independent, perhaps ornery, autonomous people, subscribing to union membership or not based on their free will to do so and their decisions regarding what they believe is the best way to gain negotiation in the world of work, to make that deal that is most comfortable for them on the job and most rewarding to their families when they bring their paychecks home.

I ask that the Members of this body vote for that worker's right to be what he is guaranteed to be in this free land, his own man, associating only with those organizations to which he makes a choice for association.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Would the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARMEY. I yield to the gentlelady from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA].

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the author of the amendment a question as to how far reaching his proposal is. The description refers only to compulsory union dues payment. However, the language is more open than that. Could the gentleman describe any other condition under which this language would be applicable?

Mr. ARMEY. No; I did try to relate to that. I think it is an important point. I had hoped I would infer that in giving the example of my own experience.

The amendment would cover the payment of union dues but also abiding by the union regulations. Obviously to some extent one has to conform to the pattern in the workplace but there should be some greater room for autonomy for the individual member.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. But the question of negotiation of contract, itself, is not in doubt.

Mr. ARMEY. No, not at all.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARMEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTON].

Mr. BARTON of Texas. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the gentleman's amendment. I have reviewed it. I think it is very definitely a positive amendment. As the gentleman knows, in our State of Texas we are a right-to-work State. We feel that it should not be required that those workers who do not officially choose to join a union or who work for affiliates of companies that are not unionized, that they should be required in any shape, form, or fashion to have part of their wages withheld in the form of an equivalent dues or anything like that, and I think this is an amendment that would go forward to prohibiting that event from ever taking place.

So I do support the gentleman in his amendment.

Mr. ARMEY. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

I again reiterate the offer I made earlier: I agree that exclusive representation is an unfair burden for us to impose on the unions of America. Insofar as anybody in the House, in a position of leadership, who would enable legislation to be moved swiftly, would like to sponsor or cosponsor with me legislation relieving the unions of that unnecessary burden so that they do not face the unfair free rider circumstance, I would be more than happy to cosponsor any legislation that would bring that freedom and autonomy to those members who choose to join the union.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman has consumed 9 minutes.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I compliment the gentleman on his legislation. My congressional district, the workers in my congressional district in Oregon badly need this legislation without crippling amendments. They need it in such places as Coos Bay, where other companies, subsidiaries are coming in and employing workers for as low as $4 and $5 per hour. A vicious cycle is setting in now that if we have minimum-wage workers on one hand, other workers are going to be driven down to the level of wage all throughout our Nation until the great work force of this Nation is reduced without purchasing power and without sufficient livelihood.

Even in the mills in my district this is occurring, when mills are being sold out to lessees or promoters who go nonunion, workers are deprived of their rights and reduced to levels of $4 and $5 an hour employment for prime manufacturing jobs.

We must stop this in this Nation, or we will not have the great work force that we have had in the past.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

This amendment is defective for several reasons. First and foremost, it injects a wholly new issue of union security which is in no way related to the scope of this bill. In the 20 existing right-to-work States the amendment is superfluous since collective-bargaining agreements may not contain union security agreements.

With respect to the rest of these States, Congress had the good sense 40 years ago in enacting Taft-Hartley Act to leave the subject to the informed judgment of individual States.

There is no reason now to depart from that course and to enact a national right-to-work law.

Therefore, the amendment is totally unacceptable on this side.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA] has 1 minute left.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of that time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY].

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Chairman, I have a clear understanding we are reaching the end of the day. Earlier, I made the comment that we live in a community and a culture that lives with the abiding hope that the lion shall soon lay down with the lamb.

I certainly want to say that the congeniality of this House today has given us hope that we will reach that point some day. In this work world that has happened.

Mr. Chairman, I will be calling for a recorded vote on this measure. I want the Members of this House to know that. Then I suspect we will all be on our way before long.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 121, noes 283, not voting 29, as follows:

Mr. UDALL and Mr. KASICH changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma, Mr. TAUKE, Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois, and Mr. RAY changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, most of us have heard the story about the company that offers prospective buyers an opportunity to purchase scenic waterfront vacation property at an incredibly low price. Based on the guarantees made by the company the buyer enters into an agreement with the company only to find afterward that the property doesn't even exist.

Now lets change this scenario a little: A construction company enters into a prehire agreement with the local union. Under the agreement both the construction company and the union agree that all work performed by the employees will be in accordance with a union contract. Based on the guarantees of the company the employees show up for work only to find the job doesn't really exist. The construction company has established a second company, operated on a nonunion basis, to perform the work of the first company.

While most of us would agree that the activities described in each case are basically illegal it is ironic that the latter situation, referred to as double breasting, has not only become general practice in the construction industry, but has the approval of the National Labor Relations Board.

Since passage of the 1959 Landrum-Griffin Act, Congress has recognized the unique nature of collective bargaining in the construction industry. Union certification procedures, used by other industries covered under the National Labor Relations Act, are virtually impossible to implement in the construction industry. Employees frequently change job sites and projects are usually completed before certification elections can be held. Landrum-Griffin took these special characteristics into account and provided that employers and unions could enter into prehire agreements prior to construction and the hiring of employees. Under these agreements, an employer and a union agree that the work will be performed in accordance with a union contract. Recent decisions by the National Labor Relations Board however, have enabled construction companies to circumvent these prehire arrangements and ignore their collective bargaining agreements through the use of double breasting.

Mr. Chairman, we have an opportunity today to rectify this situation. H.R. 281, the construction industry labor law amendments, requires employers to apply the terms of their collective bargaining agreements to all commonly owned businesses within the geographic area covered by the prehire agreement. This requirement will not impose collective bargaining agreements on separate or independent companies. It applies only to companies that perform similar work in the construction industry.

H.R. 281 also requires that prehire agreements will be binding in all cases except when a union has been decertified. The bill does not expand existing authority to make prehire agreements nor does it impose a union on employees against their will. It merely guarantees that a company cannot abrogate a legitimate prehire arrangement.

H.R. 281 seeks to protect the longstanding practice of prehire agreements and ensure the right of construction workers to have union representation. As a cosponsor of H.R 281, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to H.R. 281.

The bill purports to address abuses already prohibited under current law, drastically restricts workers' rights to decide if, and by whom, they will be represented, and prevents employees and employers from reacting with flexibility to marketplace conditions.

Specifically, H.R. 281 prohibits the legal and reasonable operation of dual shop construction companies—also known as double breasting—and elevates prehire agreements to the status of collective-bargaining contracts in a way that virtually denies workers the opportunity to ever even vote on their own representation by a union.

DOUBLE BREASTING

Supporters of H.R. 281 claim it is needed because of widespread abuses by employers seeking to evade obligations under a union shop contract or to siphon off business from a unionized subsidiary and transferring it to an open shop in which workers' rights are less protected.

In point of fact, current law already prohibits such unscrupulous practices. For 10 years, the NLRB and the courts have defined the limited conditions under which double breasting is permitted.

Dual shop firms are allowed only if their day-to-day operations, labor relations, and general management are separate. Even if two firms are found to be a single employer the union contract of one will not, and should not, be imposed on the other unless the second firm is a sham entity or the alter ego of the first, or the employees of both are found to have a community of interest.

Current law thus prevents employers from evading their labor contract obligations, while separate enterprises are allowed to operate separately and employee rights to select or reject union representation are recognized and preserved. Dual shop operations are expressly prohibited if they are set up for the purpose of evading union contracts. In fact, numerous NLRB and court cases have been decided in favor of unions when such abuses have been shown.

While seeking to treat a problem for which remedies are already available, H.R. 281 goes far beyond the fair, neutral approach taken under present law by forcing employers to decide whether to go all union or all open, regardless of market structure, employee preferences, substantial differences in the way each shop operates, and only tenuous common ownership.

PREHIRE AGREEMENTS

In any industry except construction, prehire agreements would be unlawful. However, this exception, in section 8(f) of the NLRA, recognizes the unique characteristics of the industry, such as seasonal work and transient job sites. These agreements allow both labor and employers flexibility in the hiring of workers and setting of labor standards. Thus, present law already treats construction unions more favorably then those in any other industry.

Currently, before a union may enforce a prehire agreement as a full-fledged collective-bargaining contract, it must demonstrate that it has the support of a majority of workers on that job site.

Proponents of H.R. 281 argue that, having taken advantage of the hiring hall to put a work force in place, an employer can literally walk away from an otherwise binding contract unless the union meets the difficult burden of proving its majority status. As a practical matter, however, since the union has obtained the jobs for these workers, proving majority support tends to be routine and swiftly achieved, sometimes within a matter of hours.

On the other hand, elevating a prehire agreement to the status of a collective-bargaining contract without any showing of majority support, as under H.R. 281, would summarily impose union membership, regardless of the wishes of the majority. The only way the workers could then reject or change their representation would be through a cumbersome, formal NLRB decertification election. Typically, such procedures election cannot be completed until near the expiration of the contract, which is often up to 3 years later.

In effect, under H.R. 281, most workers hired under a prehire agreement would never have the chance to vote on who, if anyone, should represent them, since their jobs would be completed before an NLRB election could be held.

SUMMARY

Current law fully and adequately protects the rights of construction workers to collectively bargain, while permitting both employees and employers to adapt to changing markets. It simplifies hiring and setting labor standards, while preserving the rights of the employer, the employees, and the union to disavow any arrangement that does not have the support of a majority of the employees.

This well-reasoned balance is gutted by H.R. 281, through a tail-that-wags-the-dog approach. The bill's real goal is to achieve by statutory fiat what has not been achieved in the competitive marketplace: A reversal of the precipitous decline in dues-paying union membership. While this might not be achieved even if H.R. 281 became law, one result would be certain: The economic options and opportunities now open to workers, employers, and customers of construction services, would be severely restricted.

For all the good reasons we are hearing here today, I urge my colleagues to defeat a bad bill.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise in strong support of H.R. 281.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of labor laws of this Nation is to ensure that the safety and fair treatment of each American worker are priorities of every employer. These laws did not arise arbitrarily, but were, rather, the result of decades of exposure of workers to hazardous workplace conditions, oppressive working hours and scant wages.

Many in my northeastern Minnesota congressional district can still remember the tales told by iron ore miners who placed their lives in jeopardy each day they entered the mines during the earlier decades of this century. Our region of the country faced the growing pains shared by every expanding region of the country; we recognized the need to develop our manufacturing and mining industries as quickly as possible, but in doing so, issues such as safety, compensation, and workcodes were given minimal consideration.

But, as this Nation became more developed, we learned to give higher priority to the rights of our workers, that fair treatment of the workforce is also good business.

It was a proud time in this Nation, and a good indication of our priorities, when the Congress adopted measures to regulate the treatment and compensation of labor. The Davis-Bacon Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, and the National Labor Standards Act have become measuring sticks by which progress is judged, and constant reminders of how far we have come.

But when these laws were adopted, certain segments of the workforce and of industry were overlooked, which now deserve attention. I refer specifically to the construction industry.

The very nature of the construction industry makes its workers different from other types of labor. Construction workers generally move from job to job, and may not remain in one position long enough to fulfill a contractual agreement with any single employer. That, however, does not minimize the need for these individuals to be protected and given the same rights as other workers.

But that is not happening, and that is why it is so important that we pass H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1986, to end the practice of double breasting, by which contractors can avoid union requirements in their labor contracts.

Under current law, a contractor who has signed a collective-bargaining agreement can establish a second, nonunion operation to perform work usually performed by the union operation. This has been occurring because the law has been interpreted to allow employers to escape contractual obligations to their workforce.

Employers are also able to circumvent the intent of prehire agreements, which contractors sign, promising to adhere to union contract guidelines in exchange for access to skilled workers. But, employers can walk away from these contracts unless the union can prove to have a majority at all worksites, regardless of the duration of the project.

This practice clearly undermines the integrity of the labor movement, while simultaneously denying nonunion workers the rights of union workers.

H.R. 281 addresses each of these issues in an appropriate manner. Employers would be required to apply the terms of collective-bargaining agreements to all employees performing the work described in the contract within the geographic area described in the contract.

The bill also prohibits double breasting, a practice which is an embarrassment to a nation which prides itself on fairness.

H.R. 281 embodies rights which should be integral to the construction industry in this Nation. It is an extension and a clarification of existing labor law, and deserves the support of this House.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985. This legislation is essential in assuring the stability of labor relations for the thousands of Americans who work in the construction trades.

In 1935, Congress passed the landmark legislation, known as the Wagner Act or National Labor Relations Act. This law is the "Magna Carta" for working Americans which promises collective bargaining to assure workers fair wages, safe working conditions, and job opportunities. The construction industry is not exempt from the provisions of the Wagner Act. Nevertheless, over the years between 1935 and 1947, the National Labor Relations Board refused to assert its jurisdiction in cases involving the construction trades. In 1959, Congress enacted section 8(f) of the National Labor Relations Act in an effort to face the realities of the situation then existing in the construction industry.

Section 8(f) allows a union and contractor to enter into a prehire agreement before a contractor has hired a full complement of workers. Typically, the contractor agrees to hire his work force through a union hiring hall and pay agreed upon wages and benefits, while the union assures the contractor access to a pool of skilled, qualified workers. Neither the contractor nor the union is obligated to sign such an agreement and once a project is under way, the workers retain the right under the act to decertify a union by a simple majority vote.

But despite this attempt to balance the competing interests of workers and their employers, in recent years, the National Labor Relations Board [NLRB] and the courts have substantially eroded the effect of these section 8(f) prehire agreements. Indeed, many contractors simply walk away from these agreements as if they had never been negotiated and agreed upon. Such actions are antithetical to the entire intent and thrust of our basic labor law.

The only conditions under which prehire contracts are treated like other collective-bargaining agreements and endure for the specified period of the contract is where the union can affirmatively prove that a majority of workers support the union shop. The short duration of many construction projects and the often transient nature of such work creates an obstacle which many construction unions cannot possibily overcome, even when a clear majority of workers may in fact support representation.

Another option which some contractors have availed themselves of is the so-called double-breasted shop where a contractor who has already signed a prehire agreement establishes a second operation to perform the same work under the same management and control as the original operation. This is a clever way for contractors to avoid outright disavowal of a contract which has previously been agreed upon and which should have the full force of law behind it.

H.R. 281, the measure before us today, would curtail this practice of double-breasting and would strengthen the enforcement of prehire contracts for the duration of the period of time which the contractor and the union have agreed upon. This premise of this legislation is actually quite simple; it says that when you give your word to abide by a labor agreeement with particular terms, you must abide by it. In any other contractual arrangement, we would expect nothing less than full compliance with the letter of the contract once the deal is made. We should certainly expect no less of a negotiated labor contract.

Congress recognized in 1959 that certain protections were necessary to protect the legal rights of workers in the construction industry. This is not special legislation which establishes special privileges for those in the construction industry. Indeed, it is no less than an effort to ensure equal treatment for those thousands of Americans who work in the construction trades.

H.R. 281 would restrict double breasting by preventing employers from establishing a second company and transferring work from its union company to its nonunion company in order to avoid the mutual obligations under a collective-bargaining agreement. It would also prevent the unilateral repudiation by a contractor or employer of a prehire agreement which has been voluntarily entered into.

Mr. Chairman, unfortunately over the past 5 years, we have witnessed a massive, large-scale assault by this administration upon the most cherished and basic legal rights of all working Americans. The National Labor Relations Board [NLRB] has become a biased forum for undoing the legal protections which America's workers expect and deserve. Had there been some basic fairness in this administration's attitudes toward working Americans and had the performance of the NLRB and our courts been less partial toward employers and the business sector, it might not have been necessary for us to pursue this legislative remedy. Nevertheless, we are here today to deal with this legislation because those who work in the construction industry cannot afford to continue to allow their rights to be trampled on.

I hope that my colleagues will join me in passing this urgently needed legislation today so that we can get about restoring some fairness in the construction industry.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further amendments, under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. MURTHA] having assumed the chair, Mr. BONIOR of Michigan, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 281) to amend the National Labor Relations Act to increase the stability of collective bargaining in the building and construction industry, pursuant to House Resolution 324, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore being in doubt, the House divided, and there were—ayes 187, noes 121.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 229, nays 173, not voting 31, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Gephardt for, with Mr. Hatcher against.

Mr. Sisisky for, with Mr. Campbell against.

Mr. Ford of Tennessee for, Mr. Hyde against.

Mr. Davis for, with Mr. Loeffler against.

Mr. Florio for, with Mr. O'Brien against.

Mr. Levine of California for, with Mr. Rudd against.

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 994

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to remove my name as a cosponsor of H.R. 994.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING THE CLERK TO MAKE CORRECTIONS IN ENGROSSMENT OF H.R. 281, CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY LABOR LAW AMENDMENTS OF 1985

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossment of the bill, H.R. 281, the Clerk be authorized to make corrections in section numbers, punctuation, and cross-references and to make such other technical and conforming changes as may be necessary to reflect the actions of the House in amending the bill, H.R. 281, the Construction Industry Labor Law Amendments of 1985.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 281, the bill just adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING FOR THE CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 1116, GARRISON DIVERSION UNIT REFORMULATION ACT OF 1986

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 422 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 422

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1116) to implement certain recommendations made pursuant to Public Law 98-360, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, each section of said substitute shall be considered as having been read, and all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5(a) of rule XXI are hereby waived. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY].

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I just arrived on the floor and, therefore, missed the final passage of H.R. 281.

Had I been present I would have voted in favor of H.R. 281.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. QUILLEN], pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield so that I might speak out of order?

Mr. HALL of Ohio. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. MICHEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I take this time for the purpose of inquiring of my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY], the majority whip, if he might elaborate on the program for next week.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the distinguished gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. MICHEL. I am primed to do so.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, the business of the House will be concluded with the adoption of the rule now under consideration. It is then the intention to have a pro forma session tomorrow, and, at the conclusion of that pro forma session, to adjourn until Monday at noon, when we would consider nine bills under suspension of the rules. The suspensions to be considered are:

H.R. 2998, Victims of Crime Act amendments;

H.R. 3826, sexual molestation of minors on Indian reservations;

H.R. 4392, financial assistance for control of plague;

H.R. 44, Electric Consumers Protection Act;

H.R. 4600, Indian health bill;

H.R. 1920, Indian gaming;

H.R. 3247, amendments to Native American Programs Act;

S. 140, the Children's Justice Act; and

H.R. 4602, Federal Housing Administration and GNMA to make additional loans, and for other purposes.

We would also consider the general debate on the Garrison Diversion Unit Reformulation Act of 1986, with an open rule and 1 hour of debate, and the rule will have already been adopted. There will be general debate only on Monday.

The votes on the suspensions will be postponed until Tuesday.

On Tuesday, the House will meet at noon and, as I say, take up any recorded votes ordered on the suspensions debated on Monday.

We will then consider on Tuesday H.R. 4515, the supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1986, subject to a rule being granted;

H.R. 4420, United States Code, title X amendments, to revise military retirement system for new members of the armed services, with an open rule and 2 hours to debate; and

H.R. 1116, the Garrison Diversion Unit Reformulation Act of 1986, to complete consideration.

At approximately 4 p.m. on Wednesday, April 23, the House will adjourn for Passover and will reconvene at noon on Monday, April 28.

Of course, conference reports may be brought up at any time and there is the usual reservation about later announcements of the program included in this announcement.

Mr. MICHEL. If I might inquire of the distinguished gentleman, I do not see anything here about a budget resolution. It would not miraculously appear, by any chance, would it, next week?

Mr. FOLEY. I do not see anything here either about a budget resolution, but there is going to be a meeting, which the gentleman may be aware of, of the joint leadership of both parties.

Mr. MICHEL. Hopefully Monday?

Mr. FOLEY. Yes, that will be on Monday, and it is hoped that from that meeting we can gain some additional guidance on the schedule for budget consideration.

Mr. MICHEL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FOLEY. I thank the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL] for yielding and would ask him to yield further.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

ADJOURNMENT FROM FRIDAY, APRIL 18, 1986, TO MONDAY, APRIL 21, 1986

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Friday, it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING ON WEDNESDAY, APRIL 23, 1986

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Tuesday next, it adjourn to meet at 10 a.m. on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, before us today is House Resolution 422. This is an open rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 1116, the Garrison Diversion Unit Reformulation Act of 1986.

The rule provides for 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

The rule makes in order the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the bill as original text for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule. Each section of the substitute shall be considered as having been read.

It should be noted that the rule waives all points of order against the substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5(a) of rule XXI. This is the prohibition against appropriations in a legislative bill. A provision of section 8 of the substitute permits previously appropriated funds for the Garrison Diversion Unit to be expended to carry out any of the provisions of the act. This would technically be considered an appropriation in a legislative bill, so the waiver is necessary.

Finally, the rule provides one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 1116 is based upon the findings of the Garrison Diversion Unit Commission. It seeks to implement a series of delicate compromises negotiated by the State of North Dakota, the Garrison Water Conservation District, environmental organizations, the Interior Department, and other interested parties. The bill makes several important changes in the makeup, scope, and cost of this project.

I am not aware of any opposition to this open rule, and I urge my colleagues to adopt it.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

□ 1730

Mr. Speaker, the rule has been ably explained.

Members will recall that last year we agreed that further spending on the Garrison Diversion Unit project was contingent on achieving a settlement of the longstanding controversies that have surrounded the project since its inception in 1944. It has been kicking around a long time.

I feel that it is time now for action, and Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of the rule. Although we know this has been a controversial issue, this legislation will allow the House to finally settle the issue.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of the rule.

I have no requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 4515, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1986

Mr. HALL of Ohio, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (99-546) on the resolution (H. Res. 425) waiving certain points of order against consideration of the bill (H.R. 4515) making urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE HONORABLE WILLIAM HILL BONER, MEMBER OF CONGRESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from Hon. WILLIAM HILL BONER:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, April 15, 1986.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Office of the Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This is to inform you, pursuant to the provisions of House Rule L (50), cl. 2, that Howard "Butch" Eley, an employee of mine on the clerk-hire rolls of the House, has been subpoenaed to testify before a federal grand jury in Nashville, Tennessee. At this time, I have no reason to believe that the subpoena does not satisfy clause 3 of the rule. Of course, should a judicial determination be necessary I will so advise you.

Sincerely,

BILL BONER,
Member of Congress.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Armed Services, the Committee on Energy and Commerce, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and the Committee on Science and Technology:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, April 17, 1986.)

ANNUAL REPORT ON THE STATUS OF THE NATIONAL WILDERNESS PRESERVATION SYSTEM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

CRACKING DOWN ON DRUGS

(Mr. WYDEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to help rid our streets and neighborhoods of some of the most insidious and violent criminals—career drug offenders.

In 1984, Congress passed the Armed Career Criminal Act to allow Federal prosecution of persons who illegally possess firearms and who have three or more prior convictions for robbery or burglary. Conviction of the firearms offense carries with it a 15-year mandatory minimum sentence in a Federal penitentiary without probation or parole.

The Armed Career Criminal Act, of which I was the House sponsor, has worked very well. According to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, there have been 90-some indictments nationwide since this law was enacted 1½ years ago.

But the Career Criminal Act might have even a greater impact on armed career criminals if it were expanded to include Federal drug felonies, BATF officials and law enforcement officials in my State say.

And for good reason. Statistics show that drugs and violence go hand in hand. According to BATF, nearly 30 percent of the persons apprehended by its agents for firearms violations during fiscal year 1985 were drug traffickers. In addition, more than 50 percent of those apprehended had prior felony convictions.

Statistics compiled by the National Institute of Justice support these findings. According to the institute, almost one-third of all inmates of State prisons were under the influence of an illegal drug or had drunk very heavily just before they committed the crimes for which they were incarcerated.

The National Institute of Justice report also indicated that:

One-quarter or more of homicides in several cities were related to drug-trafficking, and;

Seventy-five percent of all robberies reported by a national sample of juveniles and 50 percent of the felony assaults were committed by a small, but highly criminal group, comprising less than three percent of all youth who had committed three of more offenses and were pill or cocaine/heroin users.

The legislation I am introducing today, the Armed Career Criminal Act Amendments, will not singlehandedly solve all our drug trafficking problems. But by doing what BATF suggests would be helpful—extending the provisions and penalties of the Career Criminal Act to persons who have been convicted three or more times of serious drug offenses, crimes of violence or both—it should move us much further down that path. Like the Career Criminal Act it will not require local prosecutors to turn these criminals over to Federal authorities. It merely gives them one more tool with which to work.

Mr. Speaker, the U.S. attorney from Oregon, Charles Turner, and Multnomah County District Attorney Michael Schrunk, strongly support the legislation I am introducing today. The bill will give us another opportunity to zero in on the worst criminal offenders in our society, and I think law enforcement officials throughout the country will find it a valuable resource.

Mr. Speaker, my bill is a companion to legislation introduced yesterday in the other body by Senator SPECTER of Pennsylvania. I urge my colleagues to give this measure their support so that it can be passed by both bodies and enacted into law before the end of this Congress.

H.R. 4639

A bill to amend title VII of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, relating to armed career criminals, to include a serious drug offense and any crime of violence as an offense subject to enhanced penalties

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the second sentence of section 1202(a) of title VII of the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 (18 U.S.C. App. 1202(a)) is amended by striking out "for robbery or burglary, or both," and inserting in lieu thereof "for a crime of violence or a serious drug offense, or both,".

(b) Subsection (c) of section 1202 of title VII of such Act is amended by striking out paragraphs (8) and (9) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(8) 'serious drug offense' means an offense for which a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years or more is required by the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 801 et seq.), or the first section of Public Law 96-350 (21 U.S.C. 955a); and

"(9) 'crime of violence' means—

"(A) an offense that has as an element the use, attempted use, or threatened use of physical force against the person or property of another; or

"(B) any felony which, by its nature, involves a substantial risk that physical force against the person or property of another may be used in the course of committing the offense.".

AMERICANS UNDERSTAND OUR CENTRAL AMERICAN POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PENNY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, in yesterday's debate over our policy in Nicaragua, someone on the other side of the aisle made the comment that the American public does not understand what is happening in Central America. The comment was made in response to polls that show the majority of the American people oppose military aid to the Contras—sometimes by margins of greater than 2 to 1.

I believe the American people understand a great deal about what is happening in the debate over Central America:

They understand that this administration has shown little concern for the Central America between the Rockies and the Appalachians and the problems confronting our farm economy but instead focuses its attention on the Central America between North and South America where the President insists on spending millions to finance a war.

They understand that the administration wants to cut programs for education, health care, and housing in an attempt to reduce the budget deficit but easily finds $100 million to finance a flawed military policy in Central America.

They understand that our allies in the region and the people with the most at stake in the conflict—the people the administration claims it wants to protect—have asked us not to continue funding the Contras.

They understand that military aid is not a policy—it should be a last resort not our only resort. They object to the millions we are spending in an unproductive way and the negative impact this military approach has on negotiations for a peaceful settlement in the region.

Even if the American people do not understand the details of the debate over United States policy in Central America, they understand these basic principles. On that basis they believe that more military aid for the Contras is wrong.

MEDICARE QUALITY PROTECTION ACT OF 1986

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, today, I am joining with Senator JOHN HEINZ to introduce the Medicare Quality Protection Act of 1986. In recent years, attention has focused on cost control. While these efforts are important, there's no excuse for compromising quality. The patient still comes first. The Medicare Quality Protection Act contains a number of important measures to assure quality of care and to ensure access to appropriate post hospital care.

The supporters of this legislation are an impressive bipartisan and bicameral combination. This support will ensure that the bill progresses rapidly through the legislative process. I plan to get the process started in a hearing that the Subcommittee on Health of the Committee on Ways and Means will hold next week.

I include the bill summary at this point:

THE MEDICARE QUALITY PROTECTION ACT OF 1986—BILL SUMMARY APRIL 17, 1986

Medicare has undergone a number of major changes over the past several years. Cost containment measures have intensified. While these efforts have been successful in budgetary terms, concern has arisen as to the possible effects of reimbursement policy on quality of care. Particular attention has focused on the problem of premature discharge of beneficiaries from hospitals. Concern has also arisen as to the adequacy and availability of appropriate post-hospital care in view of the earlier stage at which beneficiaries are now being discharged.

The Medicare Quality Protection Act of 1986 is intended as an effective and fiscally prudent response to these concerns. The major provisions of the bill are—

QUALITY ASSURANCE IN INPATIENT HOSPITAL SETTINGS

The Department of Health and Human Services ("HHS") would be required to develop a legislative recommendation by January 1, 1988 to refuse the prospective payment system for hospitals to better account for variations in severity of illness and case complexity.

Hospitals would be required to give a written statement of rights with regard to hospital and post-hospital care under Title XVIII soon after admission.

Beneficiaries would have a right to appeal a continued stay denial to a peer review organization ("PRO") if the hospital serves a notice that continued stay is no longer medically necessary. Under current regulations, there is a window of time during which a beneficiary who appeals a continued stay denial can be liable for hospital charges for continued stay. This window would be closed to remove any unfair barriers to appeals.

Hospital incentive plans that involve payment to physicians for meeting specific length-of-stay or per-case cost targets for individual patients would be prohibited subject to civil monetary penalties. HHS would be required to develop recommendations regarding other types of incentive plans by July 1, 1987.

HHS would be required to study the adequacy of quality assurance standards for hospitals in light of changes in reimbursement policy since 1982.

HHS would be required to study the need for a separate payment to hospitals (in addition to the basic prospective payment amount) for continued inpatient stay necessitated by delays in obtaining placement of beneficiaries in appropriate post-hospital extended care facilities.

ACCESS TO APPROPRIATE POST-HOSPITAL CARE

Discharge planning would be required as a condition of participation for hospitals.

The waiver of liability for home health services would be extended to coverage denials based on homebound or intermittent care requirements.

HHS would be required to develop a uniform needs assessment instrument that could be used to assist discharge planners, providers, and fiscal intermediaries in determining whether beneficiaries are eligible for post-hospital extended care and home health services.

HHS would be required to develop an expedited review process for initial claims submitted by skilled nursing facilities and home health agencies.

HHS would be required to respond within 24 hours to inquiries concerning whether an individual's entitlement to covered post-hospital extended care has been exhausted.

Providers would be allowed to bring appeals on behalf of beneficiaries. Appeals of "technical" denials would be allowed.

IMPROVED REVIEW OF QUALITY BY PEER REVIEW ORGANIZATIONS

Hospitals would be required to submit data directly to PROs to facilitate the performance of required utilization and quality of care reviews on a timely basis.

PRO review of early readmission cases would be expanded.

PROs would be required to appoint a consumer representative to their executive boards.

PROs would be required to investigate written complaints about quality of care filed by beneficiaries.

Subject to appropriate safeguards, confidential information obtained by PROs could be shared with national accreditation bodies and with long-term care ombudsman coordinators and state protection and advocacy officials.

STUDY TO ASSIST IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF A LONG-TERM STRATEGY FOR QUALITY ASSURANCE

A major study would be commissioned to assist in the development of a long-term strategy for quality assurance. The study would be submitted to Congress within 2 years of enactment.

CODIFICATION OF TITLE 25, UNITED STATES CODE, "INDIANS"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE. UNDER A PREVIOUS ORDER OF THE HOUSE, THE GENTLEMAN FROM NEW JERSEY [MR. RODINO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, the Office of the Law Revision Counsel of the House of Representatives has prepared a committee print of a draft bill to revise, codify, and enact without substantive change certain general and permanent laws, related to Indians, as title 25, United States Code. The Office has also prepared a committee print of a draft report explaining the bill.

This draft bill and report were prepared for the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives by the Office of the Law Revision Counsel under its statutory requirement (2 U.S.C. 285b) to prepare and submit to the committee, for enactment into positive law, all titles of the United States Code.

Anyone interested in obtaining a copy of the committee print of the bill and a copy of the committee print of the draft report should contact: Edward F. Willett, Jr., Law Revision Counsel, U.S. House of Representatives, Room H2-304, HOB Annex 2, Washington, DC 20515.

Persons wishing to comment on the draft bill and report should submit those comments to the Office of the Law Revision Counsel not later than August 1, 1986.

FARM CREDIT ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1986

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JONES] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today the Farm Credit Assistance Act of 1986. This bill is aimed at relieving some of the pressure put on debt-strapped farmers, not by offering them more credit and therefore increasing their debts, but by bringing interest farmers must pay more into line with the low interest rates the rest of our economy is enjoying.

Mr. Speaker, our bill and its Senate companion, introduced by Senators BOSCHWITZ and BOREN, provides for an interest rate buy down program, administered by the States, as well as a possible principal write down by participating agricultural lenders.

We must regrettably face up to the fact that until the current administration changes its policies, which have depressed farm prices and income to new lows, more and more American farmers are going to have problems servicing their debts.

Rather than stringing our farmers along by creating more debt for them, we need to guarantee them a higher price for their crops. Until the administration changes its policies, we can provide assistance to American farmers through an interest rate and principal buy down plan.

By bringing the debt service of our farmers to an affordable level, we ensure that productive farmers, many of them young men and women just starting out, who are facing foreclosure of their farms not because of their own mistakes but because of government advice and policies, will be given the chance to become profitable.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, some of our farmers are beyond help, but others can and should be given the opportunity to bring their debt service to manageable levels.

The Department of Agriculture has not properly implemented the interest rate buy down provisions of the 1985 farm bill, and this bill is, in effect, a sort of perfecting amendment to the farm bill.

We must look at the farm situation in many ways. This credit plan is part, but not all, of the solution. We must continue to put pressure on the administration to implement the export enhancement provisions of the farm bill to restore to our farmers the foreign markets which have eroded from under them. We must take steps aimed at ensuring our farmers a fair price for their product, thus increasing their income.

Steps can be taken now toward easing the credit crunch facing our farmers, and the effects of this will be seen over the short term. The other steps which must be taken are more long term in nature, but we must begin somewhere. This is a good place to start.

Mr. Speaker, I encourage my colleagues who have not done so to join us as cosponsors of this legislation.

LYNDON LAROUCHE PARTY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBIN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, this evening, I have asked for 60 minutes for a special order which is of particular significance in this election year.

It is a special order which will attempt, through the testimony of my colleagues and statements that have been made on the record, to establish the basis for the LaRouche party in the United States of America.

I am hoping that those who read the RECORD and witness this special order will stop and reflect on what this party stands for. It is basic to our democratic form of government that diversity of opinion be allowed and encouraged. We believe in this United States of America, that political ideas must be subjected to the public marketplace.

As a Nation, we trust in the collective wisdom of the American people to consider political ideas proffered and to choose the right ideas and the right course for our Nation. This legislative body, the House of Representatives, meets on a regular basis, Democrats and Republicans, locked in debate, in bitter disagreement.

I am sure that America and those particularly who watch our proceedings, are well aware of the differences of opinion. But those ideas are brought forth in this Chamber for the consideration of the American people.

This American democratic process requires more than anything that the American people be informed. Apathy and ignorance are the Achilles' heel of Democracy.

On March 18, in my home State of Illinois, we had a primary election contest which has drawn a great deal of national attention. The reason for it, of course, is that two Statewide candidates were nominated in the Democratic primary who aspire to the beliefs of the LaRouche party. There have been many reasons offered as to why this took place. I would like to suggest my analysis of the facts indicate that the candidates who prospered in that primary under the LaRouche label were not known to the voters of Illinois as being disciples of Lyndon LaRouche.

In fact, both candidates, one for Lieutenant Governor and another for secretary of State, were running against first-time candidates in the Democratic primary. In addition, there was a factor, which is known in Illinois, I guess, as having the right name.

In our primary, in the Democratic primary, our candidate for Lieutenant Governor was a State senator by the name of George Sangmeister, an extraordinary individual, who has made a great contribution to the State of Illinois.

His opponent, a LaRouchean candidate, was named Mark Fairchild.

On the race for secretary of State, our candidate was the daughter of a former Member of the U.S. House of Representatives. Her name: Aurelia Marie Pucinski. Her opponent: Janice Hart.

When the votes were counted, the two candidates with the easier-sounding names were nominated. The LaRouchean party officials came forward and suggested it was a great victory for their party. But I can tell you as one who witnessed the Illinois primary election, that little or no attention was paid to the LaRouchean candidates, either by the Democratic political Party or by the media in the State of Illinois.

I can recall an incident in February when I went to the press room in the Illinois State capitol building and I followed some members of the LaRouchean party who had just had a press conference. Members of the press corps were standing around still laughing about the press release that they had left because they called for statewide testing of every individual in Illinois to determine whether or not they had AIDS.

Unfortunately, that laughter and mirth translated into very few of those reporteres writing stories. So the people of this State did not realize that the LaRouchean candidates stood for those ideas.

Because of this ignorance, because of their fair-sounding names and the fact that the Democratic candidates for all offices paid little or no money on their campaigns in the primary, the two LaRouchean candidates prevailed.

I believe that the Lyndon LaRouche party and their ideas are weeds that wither in sunlight. We have found in Illinois an overwhelming revulsion to the LaRouchean candidates and their platform. Unfortunately, we have found it after the fact.

Tonight we will address the LaRouche party platform and their candidates across this country.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURBIN. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO].

□ 1745

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my friend and colleague from Illinois, Mr. DURBIN, who has taken valuable time, from a busy schedule, to organize this special order on the political cult of Lyndon LaRouche. Thank you Dick for giving us this opportunity to join you this evening.

It is well worth asking why any of us here should devote any time at all to discuss a fringe political movement which has at its core bizarre conspiracy theories of the strangest type.

We have seen by the events in Illinois what effect ignoring this cult can have. On March 18, LaRouche-backed candidates won the primaries for two statewide offices. The press and our party had worked on the assumption that the LaRouche cult was so far out of the mainstream that to provide them any attention would be to bestow on them needless publicity. And it is only Monday morning quarterbacking that found this to be wrong. Over the years, hundreds of LaRouche candidates, and LaRouche himself, have run for office with virtually no success. We have ignored them for years but now conditions have changed and we must expose them for the antidemocratic neo-Nazis that they are.

Some organisms grow better in the dark, and when the light is cast upon them they dry up and blow away. It is time to focus the lights on the LaRouche cult and bring them out of the dark corner of political action into the sunshine.

Their silly beliefs are the easiest to deal with. On repeated occasions LaRouche and his various publications have claimed that the Queen of England is the head of an international drug ring. As late as a week ago, two LaRouche spokesmen interviewed on national television did not deny, but actually attempted to defend this ludicrous charge. When pressed on the point the cult members sought to link 20th century problems with the opium war of the 19th century.

History and analysis are not their strong suite.

It should be noted, under the silly category, that defamation of character is not limited to the royal family but heaped upon patriotic Americans of all stripes. Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger is a favorite target of this cult. He is accused not only of being a KGB dupe but also of having engineered the terrible famine that has gripped Africa. As a member of the Select Committee on Hunger, I can recall at no time the former Secretary being mentioned at all, but then again the committee relied on facts rather than twisted imagination. Other Americans who have been accused of assisting the KGB are William F. Buckley and former Vice President Walter Mondale, both of whom would be intrigued to find themselves working for the same boss much less the Soviets.

Last week, LaRouche himself charged Chief of the White House Staff, Don Regan, with assisting the illicit drug traffic before becoming a public servant. While Regan has come in for a lot of abuse since he assumed his White House post he does not deserve this.

David Rockefeller is accused of having a program of world domination designed after the plans of Hitler's finance minister. What can one say?

As we move from the silly to the sick LaRouche's true colors come to the fore. As recently as this month, there was an article on the Justice Department Office of Special Investigations in a LaRouche paper. This office was set up to bring the criminals of Hitler's genocidal policies to justice. Rather than praise this effort, LaRouche's "New Solidarity" came to the aid of the accused Nazi's and stated as a matter of fact that this office was set up to assist the Soviet Union track down the enemies of Moscow.

If this smacks the listener of anti-Semitism, would be correct because the cult has often made anti-Semitic charges in its publications.

The Anti-Defamation League is referred to as the American drug lobby.

In his article in the "Campaigner", another cult publication, LaRouche puts forward a twisted theory which claims the British and Jews have developed into a seperate, nonhuman, species. We have seen this kind of thinking in Nazi Germany and I had hoped it had perished in the rubble of the Berlin bunker.

Some have said that LaRouche and his followers have toned down the anti-Semitism in their rhetoric but I do not believe that such hateful ideas are changed as one would change one's socks.

Not only have they advocated anti-Semitism in their writings but they have formed political alliances with the Ku Klux Klan and the Liberty Lobby, a group which claims the Holocaust was a hoax.

As we reveal the beliefs of this cult it becomes clear that the LaRouchers pose a threat not to the Democratic Party but to our political system. In my region of California, a LaRouche supported candidate is running in the Republican primary for a State assembly seat. Statewide, there are five LaRouche candidates running in Republican primaries. As the Democratic Party had done in Illinois the Republican Party in California has done: They have disowned these cult candidates.

LaRouche candidates are running under the Republican banner in Oregon and in Ohio, and as a Member of this Congress I sincerely hope the Republican Party is successful in defeating these cult members. It will provide no partisan joy to see honorable men of the other party soiled by this bizarre band.

I want to take a few moments to comment on the press coverage of the LaRouche organization. It takes a news organization with a strong committment to bringing the facts to the American people to risk the harassment law suits that the LaRouche organizations often resort to. Freelance journalist Dennis King has contributed a wealth of information on the arcane history of this cult. John Mintz, of the Washington Post, has maintained a steady flow of articles on the cult and its various operations. The "McNeil-Lehrer News hour" devoted a long segment exploring the ideology of this cult. And NBC, which is now referred to by the cult papers as the National Bolshevik Co., has done the Nation a great service by revealing the cult for what it is. Of particular note, NBC's recent series pointed out the illegal fund raising tactics, involving credit card fraud, the LaRouchers have resorted to.

We know that LaRouche has resorted to violence, as he did when he launched "Operation Mop Up", which resulted in street fighting between rival fringe groups. We know the cult is anti-Semitic by the countless writings and publications. We know LaRouche organizations have attempted to infiltrate both political parties. And we know he has supported such anti-democratic groups as the KKK.

And we know that once all this is revealed to the American people they will reject LaRouche and his followers. It is as simple as telling the truth.

Thank you, Mr. DURBIN, for seeing that the truth is told.

Mr. DURBIN. I thank my colleague from California for joining in this special order, and his remarks will be amplified during the course of our testimony this evening. I especially appreciate the contributions made.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN].

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I congratulate the gentleman from Illinois and also the gentleman from California, while he is on the floor, for his leadership in discussing this vital matter on television and otherwise.

Again, to my friend from Illinois, I want to say: You've taken a lead on many issues, and your leadership is important.

Some people think the best way to handle extremism is to forget it; to let it die of its own weight; but sometimes it is important to tell the public what is really involved here.

I first came across the supporters of Mr. LaRouche in the late sixties, when I was in the State Senate of Michigan and later on when I was running for Governor.

In those days, Mr. LaRouche was on the far, far left. The important point to remember is, wherever they are, it is an extreme. His supporters used to come in to the meetings and disrupt them and yell out: "It's Rockefeller." Regardless of what the issue was, "It was Rockefeller."

There is always a devil within their array, always a devil. In those days, the focus was on Rockefeller.

Mr. LaRouche, according to the article in the New Republic—Mr. LaRouche was known around that time as Lynn Marcus, after Lenin and Marks, and the group that he had formed, the New York Labor Committee, had become a faction of Students for a Democratic Society.

□ 1755

The Students for a Democratic Society, an extremist group that had engaged for a number of years, on many occasions, in violence, violence. He was later expelled, according to this article by SDS, but they stayed within the extremes, within the shadows of American political life. Well, he more or less remained there with his supporters until more recently when because of the results in Illinois they burst into public attention once again. It is important for us to recognize them as the extremists that they are.

Mr. DURBIN. I think the gentleman makes an excellent point about the political ideology we are dealing with here. When you consider an individual like Mr. LaRouche, who has moved so far across the political spectrum and always ends up, as the gentleman has said, at the extreme end, it raises some serious questions. I have had the opportunity in preparation for this special order to read some of the writings of the LaRouche party, and it is an item which I will go into in the special order a little later.

I can tell you they almost defy description. On the one hand he would take a position which sounds almost progressive and then follow it up very quickly with a very conservative position. People who have walked through airports and seen the posters are as puzzled as I am as to where he fits on the political spectrum. But no matter where the issue is, you can find his interpretation of it moving him far off to the edge, far off on the corners of the marketplace where we exchange ideas in this political system.

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Absolutely. I think what is correct is, if there is any button of fear to push, they will push it. If there is any button of hate, they are likely to find it; if there is any button of bigotry, their hand is more likely than not to be on it.

You know, this Chamber some months ago, you and I debated Gramm-Rudman with all of our colleagues. There were some very acrimonious words. I do not quite remember if we voted the same way, but there were some deep differences. But they were differences with respect.

But here is a recent publication, undated but obviously recent. Here is a recent publication of the LaRouche forces within the State of Michigan. Let me just briefly refer to their description of Gramm-Rudman: It is an unconstitutional arrangement that, and now I quote, "that might suit a Benito Mussolini or a Lee Iacocca. There is nothing American about it."

Now within those 15 words or so, you can see what is being done here. There is an appeal to bigotry, lumping together Benito Mussolini and Lee Iacocca.

Then further on they say "Cheer up, SANDY and CARL." That is my brother, Senator LEVIN, and myself, "and you, too, Congressman HERTEL." That is DENNIS HERTEL of Michigan, "You can always tell the Nuremberg judges that you were 'only following orders.'"

The three of us voted for the Gramm-Rudman bill. Well, in our country we fortunately have the right to say anything at any time as long as it does not induce rioting, as long as it is not tied to violence. But people also have a right to say about expressions that they are extreme, they are filled with hatred, that they are the antithesis of what is best in the American tradition.

Mr. DURBIN. There was an analyst, I think, who captured the basis for the mentality that would follow the Lyndon LaRouche line. That mentality suggests that nothing happens in the world by random nature and nothing happens by chance; that whatever happens, if it is a negative or a positive result, that behind it is some conspiracy, some plot. There are people who are moving behind the scenes unknown to most people to cause these things to occur.

You and I in dealing with our constituency know that there is a mindset within every society that looks for that. I have farmers, for example, in downstate Illinois who are convinced that they can pinpoint the real problem of the farm crisis and usually can identify one business, one bank, one person. They have it all put together in their minds. It must be a comforting feeling, but we know how simplistic it is, with the complexity of the world as we face it day to day, the issues that we face. It is never simple that you can find one group behind it.

Mr. LaRouche and his followers are always quick with an answer, quick with a reason, and quick with a conspiracy.

That is the reason why they have managed to vilify so many different people in American society and across the world.

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. The gentleman is so right. I am so proud and privileged to stand here today with the gentleman and others of my colleagues who will be joining with the gentleman to say to America that we are going to insist on appealing to the best of people, to their hopes, not their fears, to what they prize, not what might be hated.

This group deserves the rays of sunshine, of truth and good will, and that is what the gentleman is doing here today, and I am glad to be a small part of it.

Mr. DURBIN. I thank the gentleman from Michigan. At this point I would say many people do not understand the scope of the LaRouche party organization within the United States and around the world. As we stand and speak this evening, there are some 750 LaRouchian candidates running nationwide, mostly I am sorry to say as Democrats, in 29 different States.

The group that was formerly known as the U.S. Labor Party, the LaRouche operation is officially called the National Democratic Policy Committee.

I will tell those listening and for the record that many Democrats like myself have been tricked into believing that when someone knocks on your door and announces they are with the National Democratic Party that they share my same political beliefs or at least my same partisan line. In fact, I have been surprised to find, and so have my colleagues, that oftentimes the LaRouche candidates and supporters will elbow their way into your office claiming to be part of the National Democratic Committee.

Once they sit down and open their mouths and start speaking about the issues, you quickly realize that they are far from the mainstream.

Our friends in organized labor have also found that the LaRouche party has attempted to undermine their efforts.

In 1980 Al Barkan, who was head of the AFL–CIO COPE in Washington, identified and described the Lyndon LaRouche campaign for President, and I quote, "as antilabor, anti-Catholic, anti-Semitic, and antiminorities." He formally warned working families across America not to be duped by the LaRouche party claims that they speak for the working people. This organization has been denounced from right to left, including denunciations by the Heritage Foundation, the New York Times.

In a recent article in the New Republic quoted from earlier also. Overseas the Lyndon LaRouche operation is substantial. In 1971 Lyndon LaRouche and his followers began to establish offices around the world. Former LaRoucheans who have now defected and speak to the press claim there are about 6,000 followers of Lyndon LaRouche outside the United States. They have European headquarters in Wiesbaden, Germany, and other offices in Belgium, France, Italy, Denmark, Sweden, Latin America, and the Far East.

Mr. LaRouche claims all of his offices form a worldwide network that gathers secret information from foreign governments. I will address the publications of the LaRouche operation next, but at this time I would like to yield to my colleague and friend, a leader in the Democratic Party in the U.S. House of Representatives, the gentlewoman from Ohio, MARY ROSE OAKAR.

Ms. OAKAR. I want to thank the gentleman for taking up this special order. I think it is especially appropriate not only because it affects a number of States like my own, the gentleman's, which have undergone a primary election or will be in the process of having primaries; which is interesting is that the mainstream political parties, namely the Democratic Party and the Republican Party, have both denounced any association with the LaRouche candidates. Ironically, the LaRouche candidates, I guess what I think is most offensive, among other problems, is that they have chosen to run under the banner of the Democratic Party. They do not have the courage to let people know outwardly that they are LaRouche candidates. So in the first place they try to hide under the guise of our political party, the Democratic Party.

Now one of the values that the Democratic Party believes in, and I believe Franklin Roosevelt reiterated many, many times, was that the Democratic Party was the party that brought the greatest good to the greatest number of people. And it is interesting to me that the LaRouche party is the party of exclusion. The Democratic Party is the party of inclusion. It does not matter if you are rich or poor or middle class, white or black, male or female, anyone who wants to become a Democrat, who believes in the goodness of the American people and the values of our country certainly can become one.

So our party is the party of inclusion. But when you take a look, as the gentleman has mentioned in his leadership in this area, take a look at what their values are, the party of exclusion, the party of exclusion is the party that has an anti-Catholic agenda, as witnessed by the type of violence where I believe the lieutenant governor-candidate, the LaRouche candidate in Illinois now being accused of throwing liver or something at one of the bishops of the Catholic Church, which in fact could have injured the bishop substantially.

We know that they are suspected of having possibly something to do with the distinguished dignitary from Sweden's assassination. There are some suspicions there. There are allegations, in any event.

We know beyond the anti-Catholic and anti-Christian motif there is certainly a very real agenda. All you have to do is read their material. Also, an anti-Semitic agenda, antiminority idelogy.

Interestingly enough, they are now being investigated for all the collections they have made at these airports. If you ever wonder who these people are who have banners talking about nuclear energy or nuclear warfare or nuclear weapons, they look like most people, mostly young people, kind of fresh looking, neat looking. They are trying to solicit some money from you for giving out their propagandist literature.

The fact is that they are now being investigated for this whole operation as well. No one knows where they get their money, no one knows how Lyndon LaRouche, himself, supports himself on this multiacreage in Virginia.

Mr. DURBIN. I think it is important to note Mr. LaRouche was recently queried by the press about his own source of income, and he disclosed that he does not file an income tax return in the United States because he has no source of income and no visible means of support. He says that his friends move him from one safe house to another. They take care of him and they provide for him.

That kind of mystery is surrounding a man who claims he is a viable candidate for President of the United States. It suggests to me that those again who get to know what is really behind the LaRouche party will have more questions than they have answers.

Ms. OAKAR. That is right. I would suggest to my colleague that Mr. LaRouche and many of his followers live substantially better in terms of monetary wealth than the average American does.

So I think my basic problem among other problems with the philosophy is that they tend to attempt to defraud the American people by running as members of the Democratic Party, the party of values. It is interesting when you take a look at many of the Ohio Democratic candidates running for Congress, and the so-called LaRouche candidates, they are not running on the LaRouche banner, they are running as Democrats in our Democratic Party. I suppose I would feel equally offended, I might add, if they were running as Republicans in a Republican primary because the Republicans do not share this philosphy either.

One of the things, if you look at the voter registration cards of the people running, very often they will have just moved into the community, and very often they have not voted in the United States of America, let alone in the district.

So the whole thing has a resemblance of trying to put one over on the American people.

My own feeling is they do have a right to run, even though the philosophy, in my judgment, is one of great hostility and hatred. But they have a right to run in this country. But if they want to run on the ballot, they ought to have the courage to run under their own banner, and I would suggest that it is very simple to run in this country as an independent, and then tell the American people that indeed they are followers of LaRouche, and spell out what this philosophy is. Then I think we would have more honesty, and intellectual honesty at that, in these kinds of races.

So I want to commend the gentleman.

I have several articles that I would submit with this special order that have appeared.

The articles follow:

THE LINKS BETWEEN LAROUCHE AND NEW YORK CORRUPTION

(By Daniel Patrick Moynihan)

WASHINGTON.—With a third of a century of political work behind me, I am presumably one of the senior Democrats in New York. It ought then to be expected that I should have something to say about two events that just now have our local and our national party reeling.

The events are the wrenching revelations of corruption in the Democratic administration of New York City, and the seemingly equally sudden emergence of the neo-fascist followers of Lyndon H. LaRouche in Democratic primary contests across the nation—dramatized most visibly by their victories in important primary races in Illinois.

To attempt to explain these events, and indeed to suggest some links between them, is in no way to excuse them. On March 12, I spoke to the annual dinner of the New York State Democratic Committee on the first matter—the matter of corruption. For those in attendance who might not have known what senators do, it was time to be a bit more explicit. For one thing, senators choose United States attorneys and district judges. One such prosecutor I had chosen had sent Joseph Margiotta of Nassau County, among the most powerful local Republican Party leaders of this century, to prison. It should be understood, I said, that "the same will be the fate of figures in our party if that is their due."

Indeed, I went on, "let the grifters and the boodlers and those who were merely playing a piano downstairs hear this: Pray God you do not appear before one of the judges I have chosen for the Federal bench, for almost the first of their convictions is that public corruption is more than crime, it is betrayal, and is contemptible and unforgivable.".

Then, on March 23, I spoke on the subject of the LaRouchites at the Jewish Community Council of Washington Heights and Inwood. In 1983, that community had faced a genuine assault by these totalitarian, anti-Semitic (and once Trotskyite) candidates in the school board elections. The community had fought back and won.

It was an honorable victory, I said, but not all that surprising. When it is made clear to the electorate who these people are, support for them becomes very thin. Not thin enough, but still. . . .

I was challenged in the 1982 Senate primary by a follower of Mr. LaRouche. He went on to win only 15 percent of the vote, but we worried about him, and ended up spending twice as much in the primary as in the general election.

However, neither event broke the LaRouche momentum, which began in New York City's 1981 Democratic mayoralty campaign, when the LaRouche candidate was not challenged. To the contrary, he was treated as a legitimate candidate in our party for one of the highest offices we customarily control. Soon the movement metastasized and spread coast-to-coast.

What is common to these events is a great weakening of the Democratic Party as a political institution, brought about by the rise of primary elections and the way we choose candidates for public office. (Republicans have been affected also, but they don't have our tasks such as governing cities the like of New York and Chicago.)

It comes to this. The only reason serious people will give serious time to work for a political party is that by doing so, they have some say as to whom their party nominates, and with luck, elects to office. Reduce that possibility—as the primary system does by rewarding candidates who have lots of cash, and thus exposure, or who have extremist views, and thus fanatically dedicated followers—and the uses of a political party are reduced to two: debating practice or plunder. New York City provides a mix of both.

Distrust of political parties is perhaps the oldest of our political traditions. Witness James Madison's doubts in The Federalist Papers. As an expression of that distrust, the direct primary emerged at the turn of the century as part of the Progressive assault on the Republican machines of the farm states.

But it has become a dominant political mode only in the past few decades, first as a means of choosing Presidential nominees, and thence down through the system. Mostly, television did this by making plebiscitary choices more interesting and feasible than organizational ones.

All to the good, it might seem. Until some of the bad appears.

The primary system makes money the primary arbiter of political outcomes. Not the only. But from a third of a century of encounters with both plebiscitary and organizational arrangements, I would say the main. A discernible advantage also goes to fanatic, single-minded, single-issue campaigns.

In this setting, political organizations are easily ignored or readily penetrated. As a matter of principle, Richard J. Daley would never have allowed LaRouchites into his party councils. He avoided contests. As a matter of, well, policy, Carmine DeSapio would have been equally resistant. But no one fought them in the Chicago of 1986 or the New York of 1981. It was no one's duty and evidently no one's perceived interest. (Would you like a sample from the "humor" column of the LaRouche publication, New Soldiarity? Q.: What's the meaning of the "gay rights movement?" A.: A Nazi faggot dancing the hora.)

There will continue to be much talk of limiting the influence of money in politics, and this will come mostly from people who have lots of it. (By my calculation, more than half the Senate is now made up of millionaires.) I doubt that much will happen, not least because we are beginning to sense the class advantage that campaign laws confer on the already rich. But it is possible to hope that election laws can be changed to give party conventions more of a say in the effective choice of candidates, and to give parties powers to resist intrusion by elements wholly at odds with their own principles.

John LoCicero, a principal political strategist in the 1981 New York mayoral primary, has recently been quoted as saying that "we didn't challenge anyone's signatures" because "it's not part of the democratic process." That is a perfectly honorable statement but calamitously wrong. The democratic process is not abetted by admitting neo-fascists to the Democratic Party. Let them have their own party if they like, but keep them out of ours.

Nor is the interest in honest government served by allowing the Democratic Party in the city to lapse into desuetude save as an instrument of low-grade larceny that true buccaneers won't be bothered with and true citizens won't touch.

Something like the future of the oldest political party on earth is at stake in these matters and that has something to do with the future of this Republic.

HOW NEW YORKERS DEFEATED LAROUCHE

(By Stanley E. Michels and Franz S. Leichter)

The startling victory in the Illinois Democratic primary of candidates associated with Lyndon LaRouche's neo-Nazi organization has generated the question, "How could it have happened?" It would be a mistake to consider the victory a freak event that cannot be repeated. In fact, LaRouche adherents have won large vote totals in numerous races around the country since 1982.

Our northern Manhattan community, Washington Heights and Inwood, faced a determined effort in 1983 by LaRouche candidates to win control of the local school board, the local Democratic Party and the Area Policy Board (which recommends allocation of antipoverty monies). We resoundingly defeated them in all three elections within eight months.

Our experience is that Mr. LaRouche commands numerous volunteers who work with robot-like persistence in unswerving devotion to him and his conspiracy theories. His candidates are well-financed and will say and do almost anything to win, including smearing opponents with wild charges. On one occasion, LaRouche followers burst into our offices and abused staff workers. As the Democrats in Illinois learned, it is an extremely serious mistake to laugh off the group as right-wing nuts not worthy of campaigning against.

School board elections would seem easy to win because nine posts are available, the election is nonpartisan and by proportional representation, and it historically attracts very few voters. In 1983, the LaRouche organization was known because of a visible effort in the 1981 mayoralty primary and for having fielded a candidate who got 15 percent of the primary vote against Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan in 1982. While a large number of LaRouche followers lived in our area, they had maintained a fairly low profile.

In 1983, the organization made an all-out effort to win control of the District 6 school board. It spent substantial sums promoting candidates and distributing campaign literature with facile slogans for "classical education," "Star Wars" weapons and saving the economy from depression. It was apparent to all who listened and read carefully that the real agenda was an anti-Semitic, anti-Catholic and anti-minority ideology designed to gain influence and ultimately political power for Mr. LaRouche.

With other elected officials from the area, especially Assemblymen Brian Murtaugh and Herman D. Farrell Jr., we mobilized virtually the entire community, not just the Democrats. We educated voters aobut what Mr. LaRouche really stands for. We identifed all the LaRouche candidates in order to steer voters away from them. We convinced voters who usually ignore school board elections that something crucial was at stake.

In short, we made Mr. LaRouche the issue. Using findings of the B'nai B'rith Anti-Defamation League, A.F.L.-C.I.O. and the writer Dennis King, an expert on Mr. LaRouche—that the LaRouche group is extremist and anti-Semitic—we challenged LaRouche candidates at meetings, outside subway stations and on the streets. With the support of District Council 37 (American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees) and the United Federation of Teachers, which otherwise were backing opposing slates, we flooded the community with leaflets, held numerous public meetings and sent volunteers door-to-door. Parents groups, fraternal organizations and block associations organized. Priests, rabbis and Protestant ministers supported this effort.

On election day, almost 15,000 turned out—some voters in wheelchairs and with walkers. Volunteers and local elected officials competed outside every polling place with LaRouche minions that had been imported from around the country. The highest vote any LaRouche candidate received was a mere 340.

Bolstered by this victory, the community easily fended off LaRouche attempts to capture Democratic district leadership races and seats on the antipoverty board. In 1984, Mr. LaRouche began to move his followers out of our neighborhood, to try to fool voters elsewhere. Unfortunately, he succeeded in Illinois. As we learned in Washington Heights and Inwood, the only way to deal with Mr. LaRouche is to relentlessly expose him.

LAROUCHE IS NOT A CONSERVATIVE

(By Richard A. Viguerie)

In the news coverage of the Illinois Democratic primary, in which supporters of Lyndon LaRouche were nominated for lieutenant governor and secretary of state, almost all reports identified LaRouche as "rightwing" or "ultraconservative." This makes no sense at all, except as evidence of media bias.

The LaRouche supporters call for the repeal of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, claim that Ferdinand Marcos actually won the Philippine election and demand that farm foreclosures be prevented by having the government confiscate the property. They support government subsidies for nuclear power plants and seem to be saying that most bankers are involved in drug trafficking. They say they are fighting a worldwide conspiracy that includes Nobel Prize-winning economist Milton Friedman, the Jewish organization B'nai B'rith and the queen of England. Their nominee for secretary of state in Illinois has pledged to put Washington Post staffers "on trial for Nuremberg crimes."

The lead story on the front page of the latest issue of New Solidarity, the LaRouche newspaper, is an attack on Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., accusing Helms of trying to install a Nazi as the ruler of Panama. On page two, a story about the nation's leading conservative broadcaster is headlined, "Pat Robertson Peddling Snake Oil for the KGB." Page six has a cartoon showing a demonic version of Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas, wielding an ax, and an article on page eight attacks Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz.

The anti-conservative tilt of the LaRouche organization is not surprising. Lyndon LaRouche first became well-known when he was associated with Students for a Democratic Society, the radical group founded by Tom Hayden and others. Under the name "Lyn Marcus" (taken from Lenin and Marx), LaRouche tried to take over the Socialist Workers Party; when he failed, he founded the U.S. Labor Party. LaRouche, who called himself "the American Lenin," was a Trotskyite—that is, his complaint with the Soviets was that they weren't Communist enough.

According to a 1974 FBI report, the LaRouche group known as the National Caucus for Labor Committees described itself as an "organization of revolutionary socialists." In a series of lectures published in 1976, LaRouche said his organization was "allied" with certain "Communist forces" that are "working overnight, constantly, to bring into being a new Marxist International throughout the capitalist sector."

And if the LaRouche followers are conservatives, why are almost all of the hundreds of them this year running in the primaries of the more liberal party, the Democratic Party?

LaRouche and his group are said by the media to have swung from the far left to the far right in recent years—mainly, it seems, because of their anti-Soviet position. But, in our view, this is fully consistent with his background as a Trotskyite (that is, anti-Soviet) Communist.

Despite the difficulty of pinning him somewhere on the political spectrum, the Chicago Tribune's stories on the Illinois election called the primary winners "right-wing extemists" and "ultraconservative." The Washington Post headline called them

"far-right." One USA Today headline referred to LaRouche as a "rightist," and the story called him "hard right" and "ultraconservative."

It's a pattern we've seen before. The New York Times recently listed a racist, anti-Semitic newspaper as one of the "organs of the conservative movement," and Newsweek described the newspaper's little-known publisher as one of the "apostles of conservatism." The characterizations are absurd, laughable, the stuff of which cocktail party conversation is made—so why did The Times and Newsweek sink so low?

Why do the media associate LaRouche and other bizarre-types with conservatism? Why do they lump together (as "conservatives," "ultraconservatives" or "the far-right") people who have nothing in common and whose philosophies are diametrically opposed? Why do they link libertarians like Milton Friedman, traditionalists like Pat Robertson, white supremacists like the Ku Klux Klan, anti-Communist socialists like Salvadoran President Jose Napoleon Duarte, cruel authoritarians like South Africa's P.W. Botha, totalitarians like Adolf Hitler, crooks like Ferdinand Marcos, aggressive Communists like the "hard-liners" in Moscow and weirdos like Lyndon LaRouche? All of them are referred to by the media as "conservatives," although in fact only Friedman and Robertson are conservatives.

Why do the media refer to them all the same way? What could they all possibly have in common—except that they are not liberals? Aha! That's the answer! Throughout history, many a primitive tribe has called itself by a name that means, simply, "human beings." In that view, the world is divdied into two groups: 1) "us" and 2) everybody else.

That's how the national news media classify people. A liberal is a person who agrees with them. And a conservative? A conservative is anybody else.

Ms. OAKAR. They have appeared not only in the New York City papers, but they have appeared indeed throughout the country.

Our country is a country that believes in basic ideas of freedom of expression and we believe in the values of human values toward one another. I for one really believe that if the LaRouche people who have changed their political philosophy apparently from the Marxist philosophy to the some other kinds of insidious views and want to run as candidates, they should have the courage to run under their own banner and not attempt to deceive the American people. That is really what it is all about.

I just want to close by saying that we ought not to call attention to them. I know in my own case and in some of the cases of my colleagues from Ohio, they say you will just bury that individual in terms of the election, and you will win by a landslide in the Democratic primary.

I do not believe we should take this lightly. I think that we have an obligation. If they do not want to tell the American people what they really stand for and who they really are, I think somebody should do that, because very often people are not as informed about political philosophies as we would like to see happen. They are certainly not going to get a handle on the LaRouche philosophy from those people running under the Democratic Party's banner.

So again, I want to commend the gentleman. I want to challenge the LaRouche candidates to in the next election, run under your own banner. Run as independents as LaRouche candidates. And then you lay it all out to the American people and tell them what you stand for. I really suspect, because of my great belief in the wisdom and the values of our American people, they will reject this kind of insidious philosophy soundly.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman from Ohio for joining. I know the gentlewoman has had firsthand experience with LaRouche candidates in the State of Ohio. Unfortunately, those of us in Illinois have learned the hard way that they cannot be ignored and written off as kooks. They must be taken seriously.

Mr. Speaker, one of the things that I was surprised to learn after the primary in the State of Illinois in attending a meeting with Democratic Party officials was that one of the leading labor leaders in my own congressional district had been receiving a LaRouche party publication for some months. He was not aware of the fact that it was a publication from the LaRouche party.

This evening I would like to comment, if I can, on the publications of the LaRouche party, so that those who will read these words and hear this statement may take a look in their own mailboxes, and many may be surprised.

The LaRouche party publishes a twice weekly newspaper entitled New Solidarity. They publish magazines entitled Campaigner, Fusion, the International Journal of Fusion Energy, War on Drugs, Young Scientist, the American Labor Beacon, which I understand they have discontinued recently.

They publish books through a company in New York known as the New Benjamin Franklin House Publishing Co. Two of their more popular titles are "Dope Incorporated," and the other is "The Power of Reason," which we may find hard to imagine is the Lyndon LaRouche autobiography.

But far and away the most lucrative publication of the LaRouche party is this weekly magazine known as the "Executive Intelligence Review." It is directed toward the security concerns of business and government. It claims 7,000 subscribers.

In Lyndon LaRouche's own words, "* * * chiefly those among political, financial, industrial, and trade association clients internationally."

To subscribe to this magazine that is published on a weekly basis, it costs $400 a year. Over-the-counter sales are estimated at between $600 and $1,000. If the figures are accurate that are provided by the LaRouche party, they generate about $3 million in annual revenues from this publication. They claim to have international bureaus in 16 cities in the United States and around the world.

Their articles in various publications, and particularly in this one, have included charges that former Ambassador Averell Harriman was a liberal fascist. I have a certain fixation with Mr. Harriman and his family, and I found throughout their publications continuing reference to him. In fact, when the senior Senator from the other body from New York recently ran against a LaRouche candidate in the primary, that candidate made a big controversy of the fact that the candidate he was opposing had a wife who formerly worked for Governor Harriman, as if this in and of itself was some condemnation.

They have also claimed in their publications that organized crime engineered the selection of Chuck Manatt as head of the Democratic National Committee. Keeping in mind that Chuck Manatt, originally an Iowa farm boy, went on to his fortune in business in California and eventually headed the Democratic National Committee, the real Democratic Party, it is hard for me to imagine that anyone who has met or worked with Mr. Manatt would fall for that type of a charge. But imagine, if you will, how few people actually meet him or work with him, and how many people, unfortunately, would be easy prey for this kind of hatred and vile comment.

This issue of the Executive Intelligence Review which I have in my hand is one of the most recent. I have to tell you that I did not subscribe to this. What I have here is a mailing label, "To Representative Richard Durbin from a Concerned Constituent." Someone, somewhere paid some money so that I might receive this magazine. I hope to use the magazine to let people around the Nation and those of my colleagues in Congress know what kind of hate-filled accusations are made by the LaRouche party. We have statements in here that are incredible in reference to the Illinois Democratic scene.

They have claimed, of course, a great victory in the March 18 primary. As I said in my opening remarks, I believe that victory was occasioned by the lack of information being given to voters rather than a conscious choice on behalf of the LaRouchians.

They seem to be able to tie everything together. They have said that the one reason why Adlai Stevenson, the Democratic nominee for Governor, does not choose to run with a LaRouche candidate, Mr. Mark Fairchild, was that he is running the risk, Mr. Stevenson is running the risk, "of being driven out of the party by the elite crowd of Gold Coast," which is a reference to an area in Chicago, "cocaine-sniffing liberals."

This is not the only rash statement made by the LaRouchians in our area.

We, unfortunately, in the Democratic Party for the time being are saddled with a candidate whom we will have nothing to do with by the name of Janice Hart. She is our Democratic nominee for Secretary of State and a LaRouchian. I want to read some of the comment she made in a press conference after her nomination.

She said in the report that appeared in Newsweek magazine. "In the flat tones of a military commander at a press conference in Springfield, she said, 'We will roll our tanks down State Street in Chicago and make sure every citizen is armed with reason and beauty. We will hang traitors and hang people who are responsible for feeding our children drugs. He [Lyndon LaRouche] will put the fear of God in people like Henry Kissinger and the State Department.' "

And then she called our State Department "the biggest hot bed of treason in this Nation since Aaron Burr killed Alexander Hamilton."

I have been a member of the Democratic Party in the State of Illinois now for over 20 years. I have run as a candidate for Lieutenant Governor across the State of Illinois.

□ 1820

I am familiar with my colleagues who share that party label.

Ladies and gentleman and colleagues, I can tell you that none of them share any belief with Mrs. Hart in reference to what this Nation is made of and where it is going. We, unfortunately, in Illinois are saddled with the responsibility of ridding ourselves of what has become a very serious interloper on our ballot.

Reference was made earlier to some of the more outrageous charges made by the LaRouche party. The one that puzzles me the most, because I find it hard to believe that even the LaRouchians can take it seriously, is the suggestion that the Queen of England is a dope dealer.

I quote Mr. LaRouche, who appeared on NBC television on March 4, 1984, on a program known as "First Camera." When he was asked, "Do you really believe the Queen of England is a dope pusher?" he said, "Of course she's pushing drugs * * * that is in a sense of a responsibility: the head of a gang that is pushing drugs; she knows it's happening and she isn't stopping it."

They have also charged that the National Broadcasting Corp. [NBC] is infiltrated by agents of the Soviet security agency, the KGB.

References were made earlier to statements which have been made continually since 1978 by the LaRouche party, anti-Semitic statements. In fact, at one point, when Lyndon LaRouche was accused of being anti-Semitic, he sued the Anti-Defamation League for libel because they called him anti-Semitic. After the evidence was presented at his trial, the libel charges against the ADL by Mr. LaRouche were dismissed.

At this point I would like to read to you what the justice of the New York State Supreme Court said in October 1980, in dismissing Mr. LaRouche's charges. Supreme Court Justice Michael Dontzin held that the Anti-Defamation League's characterization of a LaRouche group as anti-Semitic constituted, in his words, "fair comment" and that the facts presented in the case "reasonably gave rise" to such characterization.

Lyndon LaRouche is the same individual who has dismissed the Holocaust which claimed the lives of 6 millions Jews as merely mythical, in his words.

And they have an unusual view of the Soviet Union. Here is a man who started off as a Marxist or a Trotskyite, came full circle through the left and over to the right. But if you read his publications, it is hard to escape and to miss the fact that within that publication he called the idea that the Soviets have ambition of world domination a delusion. He criticizes the Solidarity movement in Poland. And there are several articles that I have read where he has praised to the high heavens the Soviet educational system.

Statements have been made earlier by my colleagues about why the LaRouchians decided to pick on the Democratic Party. I do not know. When I read Mr. LaRouche's own comments and his newsletter of his organization of March 1982 he says:

The difference between Republican and Democratic kooks is that the Democrats are outright Fascists.

This is the party where he is trying to find a home.

I can recall at the convention which our party held during the last Presidential campaign that we were assaulted continually on the streets by those who wanted us to a sign petitions so Lyndon LaRouche could address the Democratic National Convention. He never received that opportunity. Although I would defend his right to speak to any group, he no more belongs with the Democratic Party than I belong with any other political party than the one I claim.

Mr. LaRouche has also some unusual phobias. One of them is the phobia of assassination. He believes that he is an assassination target. In fact, he believes the plot that is out to get him involves European Fascists, the British intelligence network, the Russian order spinoff of the Order of the Malta, Hinckley himself, the would-be assassin of President Reagan. And Mr. LaRouche goes on to say that he is not the only target, that this worldwide conspiracy has fingered not only him but President Reagan and Pope John Paul II.

Mr. LaRouche was asked what his four-point program was to revitalize the American economy. Here is what he said:

His first point was to restore the United States to the gold standard; second, federalize the Federal Reserve, making it the Third National Bank; and then he came in with a public works project; and he closed with one of his favorite topics, an energy policy based on nuclear power.

Another favorite target of the LaRouche operation is the National Education Association. Those of us who work with members of the National Education Association on a day-to-day basis know them to be dedicated teachers who work in our classrooms, working as hard as they can to educate our children, to make certain that the next generation of Americans has the skills to be able to compete.

Here is what Lyndon LaRouche says of the National Education Association:

If we were to ask what institution has been most responsible for the destruction of education in the United States, the answer unequivocably is the National Education Association.

And he goes on to say—and again here comes the conspiracy—that the NEA serves the interests of those who would allow the Soviets to achieve world hegemony.

Henry Kissinger has been a favorite target of the LaRouche party. They have called him one of the leading Soviet moles.

If you will take a look sometimes at the publications of the LaRouche party, you will find some outrageous comments in reference to former Secretary Kissinger. In fact, I will not submit this one for the record because the libelous and slanderous statements included in there about Mr. Kissinger do not deserve to be part of this CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

But it is interesting, to me, within months after this publication from Mr. LaRouche, which I have in my mind, lambasting Kissinger, hit the stands, that an incident occurred. You may remember it. It was in 1982. At that time former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and his wife Nancy were walking through the airport in Newark, and they chanced to pass by one of those ubiquitous card tables where the Fusion Energy Foundation had an information booth set up. It was manned by a 6-year LaRouche veteran and a colleague. As Mr. Kissinger and his wife passed by, one of them who recognized him jumped up and, despite the fact that Mr. Kissinger was on his way to Boston, where 3 days later he was to undergo a triple bypass operation, this individual confronted Mr. Kissinger and asked him why he prolonged the Vietnam war. And then he made a comment to his wife, an insulting comment, and she stepped forward and grabbed the person. That LaRouchian then filed suit against Mrs. Kissinger. Sometime later, commenting on the obscene suggestion that was made by the LaRouchian, the interviewer was asking the person who assaulted them, "Why did you do it? Why did you grab him in the airport?" And he said, "Boy, these people, these Kissinger folks are really touchy people."

I would suggest that goes far beyond ordinary political comment. What we have here is not the statement of expression of an opinion but instead we have acts of violence engendered again by this conspiracy theory.

Another frequent target was our former candidate for President in the Democratic Party, Walter Mondale, who was claimed to be by the LaRouchians a Soviet agent of influence.

My colleagues, what I have found in Illinois since the election is that we have learned an awful lot about the LaRouchian party. In a recent poll in my own congressional district, fewer than 5 percent of the voters believed that the Illinois Democrats who voted for the LaRouchian candidate had any idea who they were voting for.

In fact, in one poll that was taken after the election by our gubernatorial candidate, Adlai Stevenson, they asked for a public-esteem rating, an approval rating. That is a common question in polls, where names are given of prominent public figures and, of course, the person queried is asked whether he holds him in high esteem or not. And those who are very popular score high. It may be of interest for those listening to know that Lyndon LaRouche scored 1 point below in public esteem an individual by the name of Mikhail Gorbachev, the General Secretary of the Soviet Union.

There are additional concerns which we have about the impact of the LaRouchian organization. A recent publication of the New Republic, in November 1984, contained an article written by Dennis King and Ronald Radosh, entitled "The LaRouche Connection." It raises serious questions about what the LaRouche party is up to in terms of providing information to elected officials. They turn up unannounced and uninvited many times to testify at hearings, oftentimes embarrassing candidates that they might come in to endorse for nomination to various Cabinet posts and high-level positions.

Dr. Norman Bailey had resigned in December 1983 from his posts as a special assistant to the President and as the National Security Council's senior Director of International Economic Affairs. The National Security Council is one of the most sensitive agencies of the Federal Government. It is empowered to consider highly classified information and make important decisions about the future national security needs of our Nation. He justified his meeting with the LaRouchian people, saying that they offered "one of the best private intelligence services in the world."

I find this incredible that a person who is rational, working for this administration or any administration, if they know even the very least about the LaRouchian party, what they stand for and what they have said, would claim that they have one of the best private intelligence services in the world.

There is also evidence of a gentleman by the name of Dr. Ray Pollock in this same article that is quoted, who works with the National Security Council, and one of the chief architects of President Reagan's star wars policy. Mr. Pollock, who resigned from the administration, has said that he met on several different occasions with the LaRouchian officials. He said that he was intrigued by LaRouche's talented followers, and he said that some of the statements they made spoke well for their intelligence network.

I think, with all the resources of the United States of America, we do not need to rely on Lyndon LaRouche for information. The kind of twist and bent that he gives to facts is something that our country certainly has no need of.

I would like to close this special order by commenting that there are many who have cautioned over the years that we should ignore people like Lyndon LaRouche and they will go away. We found on March 18 in the State of Illinois that ignoring Lyndon LaRouche ended in the nomination of two of his disciples on the Democratic Party ballot. It was a source of great embarrassment and humiliation to the Illinois Democratic Party. We are working hard now to clear up this problem so that the voters in November will not be faced with the choice of seeing only LaRouchian candidates holding the Democratic banners for Lieutenant Governor or secretary of state.

But in this process we have learned a lot. I hope it is a lesson that is shared with the rest of the Nation. I hope that those who are voters and who are interested in this process will take the time to ask important questions, to ask of candidates claiming to be part of one party or another what they really stand for. And if they identify themselves as followers of Mr. LaRouche, I hope that you will follow through with questions along the lines we suggested today.

As was stated earlier, the ideas of the LaRouchian party are like weeds that wither in sunlight. I hope during the course of this special order we have shed some light on those ideas and that my colleagues and those listening will take the time to inquire and become informed voters. When they do, if they choose the LaRouche party platform, that is part of being American, and I would of course defend their right to do so; but I hope that choice is an informed choice.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

JOSEPH AND RALPH BERNSTEIN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, on February 26, as you may recall, the House voted in favor of two resolutions citing Joseph and Ralph Bernstein, the directors and managers of the New York Land Co. in New York, for contempt of Congress as a result of their refusal to cooperate with the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs, which was then in the process of conducting an investigation into the hidden wealth of Ferdinand and Imelda Marcos, of the Philippines, here in the United States. Those resolutions were adopted, in the case of Ralph Bernstein, by a margin of 352 to 34 and, in the case of Joseph Bernstein, by a margin of 343 to 50.

The Bernstein brothers had refused to answer a whole series of questions put to them by myself and other members of the subcommittee on the grounds that it would require them to violate the attorney-client privilege if they were to divulge the information we were seeking.

It was the opinion of the House counsel and the minority counsel of the House, whose judgment we solicited, that in fact the attorney-client privilege was not being properly invoked.

For that reason, the subcommittee voted to cite the Bernstein brothers for contempt. The full Foreign Affairs Committee then voted overwhelmingly to cite them for contempt and, as I just indicated, the full House voted to cite them for contempt as well.

A few months later, after the restoration of democracy in the Philippines and the flight of Mr. Marcos and his wife, Imelda, from Manila to Honolulu, documents were discovered at Malacanang Palace clearly linking Joseph Bernstein, at least, to President Marcos and some of the real estate owned by the Marcoses in New York, which our subcommittee was investigating. A grand jury, under the direction of the U.S. attorney, began proceedings pursuant to the adoption of the contempt of Congress citation. The Bernstein brothers, through their attorneys, contacted me as chairman of the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs and indicated that they were now prepared to cooperate with our subcommittee and wanted to know, if they did cooperate with the subcommittee, whether we would be prepared to communicate that fact to the U.S. attorney.

We indicated that we would be. I met personally with the Bernstein brothers for several hours. Our subcommittee staff met with them for many more hours and the Bernsteins then appeared before the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs a few weeks ago in public session and, testifying under oath, answered without exception all the questions we put to them. Their testimony was indeed very helpful. It demonstrated very clearly that the Marcoses were the owners of about $350 million of prime real estate in the New York area. They provided our subcommittee with a number of details and some very relevant information which we did not previously have.

In view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the primary interest all along was not in sending the Bernstein brothers to jail as a result of their contempt of Congress, but in obtaining the information which they alone had, which was directly relevant to the investigation of our subcommittee, I felt it was appropriate to seek the authority and the mandate of the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs for a letter to be sent to the U.S. attorney indicating that the Bernstein brothers have now cooperated with the subcommittee.

That motion was adopted by a vote of 5 to 1 in the subcommittee earlier today, and pursuant to the motion, I am now bringing it to the attention of the House in order to give any of our colleagues who may have any questions or concerns about our intent to send such a letter, the opportunity to raise those questions or concerns with me or with my very good friend who is in the House at this point, the very distinguished ranking minority member, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LEACH].

In the absence of a direction from the House not to proceed with such a letter, inasmuch as it was the full House which voted to cite the Bernsteins for contempt, it would be our intention to send a letter to the U.S. attorney indicating that the Bernsteins have cooperated with us and have answered without exception all the questions we have put to them. Based on my discussion with the U.S. attorney, it is my impression that upon receiving such a letter, together with a transcript of the subcommittee hearing at which they testified, that the U.S. attorney will drop the grand jury proceedings against the Bernsteins.

Let me just say, Mr. Speaker, before yielding to my good friend, the gentleman from Iowa, that I genuinely regret the fact that the Bernsteins did not cooperate with us back in December when we originally called them before us. If they had been willing to do so, it would have saved the members of our subcommittee and the staff literally hundreds of hours of work. We would have been able to complete our investigations in a far more timely and expeditious action. They chose instead to stonewall the committee. As a consequence, we felt we had no alternative but to cite them for contempt; but I am pleased that the rights of our subcommittee and the Congress have ultimately been vindicated. We received at the end of the day the information we were seeking. We were able to demonstrate, with the help of the Bernstein brothers, that the Marcoses, as we suspected from the beginning, are, in fact, the owners of hundreds of millions of dollars worth of real estate in New York.

In view of the fact that we have obtained the information we were seeking at the time, I think it would be appropriate for us to send such a letter to the U.S. attorney.

I am now happy to yield to my very good friend, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LEACH], whose cooperation throughout the course of this investigation has made it possible for us to proceed in a genuine bipartisan fashion.

May I say here also that I have a particularly high regard and genuine appreciation for the extent to which the gentleman from Iowa throughout the course of our investigation consistently sought to protect the interests of the various witnesses and to make sure that the investigation was conducted in a way which would be compatible with the highest standards of due process and fairness for all of the individuals involved. I think the timely representations in that regard were without exception extraordinarily constructive and I think they were a critical factor in enabling our subcommittee to maintain the support not of other members of the committee, but the respect and confidence of the Congress as a whole and of the people of our country.

I think we can be proud not only of what we were able to uncover throughout the course of this investigation, but of the way in which the investigation itself was conducted. I truly believe it was a model for congressional investigations of this character and a larger part of the credit is due to the gentleman from Iowa, who played such a responsible role throughout the investigation.

I am now happy to yield to my good friend for whatever comments he would like to make.

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his kind comments.

Mr. Speaker, as Members of this body will recall, the House voted on February 27, 1986, to approve House Resolution 384, calling for certification to the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia of a report from the House Foreign Affairs Committee citing Joseph and Ralph Bernstein for refusing to answer certain questions of the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs pertaining to allegations of Marcos family investments in the United States.

In concluding my remarks on the contempt resolution brought before the House, I noted that Joseph and Ralph Bernstein held in their own pockets the keys to their potential incarceration. I expressed, along with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ] the continued hope that in the wake of House action, Joseph and Ralph Bernstein would reconsider cooperation with the subcommittee in its quest for the truth in this investigation.

Subsequent to House approval of House Resolution 384, Joseph and Ralph Bernstein came to the subcommittee and presented information and material which had every indication of being forthright and which provided a perspective to the committee which bore direct relevance to its investigation.

Precedents of the House in matters of contempt are important. While the model established of allowing a witness to be legally unaccountable for noncooperation with a committee investigation until the House itself acts and a court proceeding is instituted is imperfect, I nevertheless believe, as a general proposition, that the House should go to great lengths to accommodate witnesses who wish to cure, through voluntary cooperation, their prior intransigence.

The investigatory powers of the House are so extraordinary that committees of this body have an obligation to bend over backward not to be coercive. Congressional investigations should be governed by the desire for information, not retribution. A request from the House to the Justice Department to seek legal redress should only be made with the greatest reluctance. Punitive measures should always be the last resort after all means for obtaining desired information have been exhausted.

Mr. Speaker, contempt citations should be judged on a case-by-case basis. In the Bernsteins' case, little would appear to be served by pressing legal action at this point.

Accordingly, unless this notification to the House of intent to proceed produces substantial objections of a nature that this Member is not currently aware, I intend to join with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ], and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] in writing the Justice Department pursuant to the direction of the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs, urging that the record demonstrating cooperation by Joseph and Ralph Bernstein be provided to the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia. In view of their belated cooperation with the committee of jurisdiction, I believe the legal proceedings against the Bernsteins should be dropped.

Finally, let me just conclude with a footnote that relates to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ]. I know of no investigation from a committee of the Congress that reflected greater judgment of a committee chairman, nor greater personal courage, in the sense that it brought before this House legal proceedings for two individuals who reside in the same town as the gentleman from New York. That is a very difficult thing to consider doing. It implies taking on political and social liabilities of an extraordinary nature, but it became very clear to me that the gentleman from New York's desire to protect the Congress was more important than any political ramifications that might unfold in New York.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LEACH] for his remarks. I deeply appreciate them.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this brings to an end the episode of the Bernsteins and this Congress and that this will enable us to close the book on at least their role in this investigation. I have no further comments to make.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of this special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. FORD] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my regrets for missing an important vote before the House this afternoon. Due to death in my family, I was unavoidably absent.

Mr. Speaker, the vote I am referring to concerns H.R. 281—the double breasting bill. I am strongly in favor of this bill and had I been present for the vote I would have answered in the affirmative.

H.R. 281 will increase the stability of collective bargaining in the building and construction industry. This bill will tighten the standards limiting dual shop operations and will in effect bring about greater employee security.

The legislation is needed more than ever since the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act enacted by Congress in 1959 have been largely negated by recent decisions of the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. Speaker, I feel H.R. 281 is necessary to reverse the effect of the Board's decisions and will achieve what Congress sought through its enactment of the National Labor Relations Act.

For these reasons Mr. Speaker, I lend my support to the passage of the bill.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 4515

By Mrs. SCHROEDER:

—Page 34, after line 18, insert the following new section:

SEC. 206. Funds appropriated by this or any other Act for the Department of Defense or the Department of Energy may not be obligated or expended before January 1, 1987, to carry out an explosive test of a nuclear device until the President certifies to Congress that he has reason to believe that the Soviet Union has conducted, after April 17, 1986, an explosive test of a nuclear device.

SENATE—Thursday, April 17, 1986

(Legislative day of Tuesday, April 8, 1986)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Righteous God, trouble comes in like a flood—like an avalanche threatening to bury us: Libya and the Middle East, Nicaragua and Central America—oil crisis and farm crisis, with chain reactions exploding in many different directions—budget deadline and deadlock like an irresistible force meeting an immovable object—an incomprehensible national debt—unfavorable balance of trade with potential trade wars seething—and a host of other intransigent domestic and international issues that challenge and provoke—and the Senate right in the middle of all of it. Help us to see, wise Father, that God alone is big enough to handle this cosmic mess and He is ready to enable those who bear the burden to find resolution. In His name Who is the way, the truth, the life. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader, Senator DOLE, is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the President pro tempore, Senator THURMOND.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each, to be followed by special orders for not to exceed 5 minutes each for Senators HAWKINS, CRANSTON, WILSON, DIXON, ROCKEFELLER, BINGAMAN, CHILES, LEVIN, RIEGLE, BAUCUS, GORE, and PROXMIRE.

Mr. President, I would indicate that the list for special orders seems to be growing on a daily basis. I would hope sometime in the next few weeks we can reach some agreement for dividing special orders for the morning and afternoon, or limiting the amount of time for special orders. Special orders today will require 1 hour and 5 minutes.

Following the execution of the special orders, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 11:30 a.m.

Mr. President, we are hoping we can move the rollcall vote from 11:30 to 12 noon. I will make that request, if the minority leader has no objection.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the hydrorelicensing bill occur at 12 noon rather than 11:30 a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCHRAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as soon as we complete action on the hydrorelicensing bill, which will just be the vote, we will move to S. 1923, the bankruptcy judges bill. It is my understanding that that will not take more than a couple of hours.

We have completed action on the Federal Deposit Insurance Act. That will leave the technical amendments to the crime bill. I think I am in a position to say there will be no votes tomorrow. Maybe we will lay something down today and there might be some debate tomorrow, but I think this is a particularly bad week for Members on both sides who want to visit their home States.

Mr. President, I hope Members will cooperate and try to clean up these minor bills that are on the calendar.

I want to thank the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON] for his cooperation on the Federal Deposit Insurance Act last night. That action will be helpful to Senator BOREN and others with particular problems in their States.

Mr. President, I see no reason why we could not complete our work fairly early this evening. However, there will be rollcall votes today.

S. 2335—ANTI-TERRORISM ACT OF 1986

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will introduce later today a bill that will clarify Presidential authority and strengthen the President's hand in dealing with international terrorism directed at our country and our citizens. I am honored to be joined as an original cosponsor of this bill by the distinguished Senator from Alabama and chairman of the Judiciary's Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism, JEREMIAH DENTON. In addition to his work on this bill, Senator DENTON has a number of other important legislative initiatives on the matter of terrorism.

I would also note that I have worked closely in developing this legislation with three distinguished Members of the House of Representatives: Congressman JOE BARTON of Texas, who first suggested a bill and came up with the basic concepts we have included in it; and Congressmen DUNCAN HUNTER of California, and BOB LIVINGSTON of Louisiana, each of whom has made valuable contributions to the final product. Those three Congressmen will be introducing the bill in the House today.

NOT A "QUICK FIX"

In light of ongoing events involving Libya, this is obviously an appropriate time for the Senate to consider legislation related to terrorism. And, as my remarks will indicate, the substance of this bill will have direct bearing on situations such as the one we see unfolding in Libya.

But it is important to emphasize that this bill is not any kind of "quick fix" reaction of the Libyan situation. I and my cosponsors have been considering terrorism legislation for several months and have been working on this bill for several weeks. It deals with an issue broader than Libya and more enduring than Qadhafi. Terrorism is a long-term problem and requires a long-term solution. Passage of the bill will provide one more important tool to help find that solution.

REAFFIRMING THE PRESIDENT'S AUTHORITY

Let me briefly outline the contents of the bill. As I noted, its central purpose is clarifying the extent of the President's authority to deal with terrorism, thereby strengthening his hand as he copes with this problem.

Personally, I do not believe this bill gives the President any new authority. In my view, the President's constitutional role as Commander in Chief, his clear obligation and authority to defend the United States and its citizens and our country's right of self-defense embodied in the Constitution and specifically included in the United Nations Charter already endows the President with decisive, independent power to respond to terrorist acts and to the threat of terror against America and Americans.

But I am aware that some dispute that view. Certainly, our current debate—an unfortunate debate, in my opinion—over whether the President adequately consulted the Congress prior to the recent air strikes on Libya and whether and how the War Powers Resolution of 1973 applies to the current situation reflects the fact that there is honest disagreement on this issue.

Harry Truman is famous for saying that the "buck stops" in the Oval Office. Maybe that was true in Truman's day. But today every Senator seemingly insists on putting in his 2 cents' worth on that buck. This is no way to make or implement policies on terrorism.

So it is very important to make clear in law—and equally important to make clear to the world, including the world's terrorists—that the President does have extensive, flexible authority to do what is necessary to strike back against terrorists and to preempt planned terrorist attacks against the United States and its citizens. By passing this legislation, we will cement the authority in law and send a strong message around the globe: The President has the power to act and has the political backing of the American Congress in doing what he must. And if that message is sent now, through passage of this bill, perhaps in the future, the President will not have to send as many of the kind of messages our F-111's delivered to Qadhafi this week.

DEFINITIONS OF "TERRORISM" AND "TERRORIST"

What, exactly, does the bill do? It defines terrorism as a "form of aggression" against the United States. As such, it broadens the conception of terrorism from being just another kind of criminal act and calls it what it is—an attack on our country and our national interests. In that way, the bill will underscore that the President's powers as Commander in Chief come directly and automatically into play when terrorism occurs or is being planned.

The bill defines "terrorist" and "terrorist organization" to include all of those people and groups which can be shown to be directly involved in the planning or conduct of terrorist acts or which directly support such planning or acts. It is not only the bomb-throwers we have to deal with; it is everyone in the network, up to and including governments like Libya's, which openly and aggressively espouse state-sponsored terrorism as an instrument of policy, and people like Qadhafi, who masquerade as legitimate national leaders.

USE OF ALL APPROPRIATE MEASURES

When such groups or people engage in specific acts of terror aimed at Americans, or when the President has clear evidence that they intend to, the bill reaffirms his authority, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, to "use all such antiterrorism and counterterrorism measures as may be necessary to prevent the loss of lives of U.S. citizens," including use of "deadly force."

Should the President utilize the authority affirmed in the bill, he would be required to report to the Congress within 10 days, specifying "in detail the terrorist threat or terrorist act which justified" his action.

AUTHORITY LIMITED TO TERRORISM SITUATIONS

Perhaps the best summation of the bill is that it affirms the President's very broad authority but only in the relatively narrow—but, of course, critical—field of dealing with terrorism. The bill has no application—and makes no judgment, one way or the other—on the question of Presidential authority to deal with other threats to our Nation or other international situations. The bill does not seek to expand, or in fact expand, any Presidential authority in these broader national security or foreign policy fields.

I have my own views about what the President can do in those areas, and each Senator undoubtedly has his or her own views, too. But this bill purposely avoids those issues. The question of terrorism and our ability to deal with it is too urgent to get bogged down in an endless redebate of the War Powers Resolution of 1973.

PARTIALLY SUPERSEDES WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

Having said that, though, let me make clear that this bill would supersede the War Powers Resolution in those instances—but only in those instances—when the President might use, or contemplate the use of, American military forces to deal with terrorism.

NO SPECIFIC REQUIREMENT FOR CONSULTATIONS

In such circumstances, the bill would eliminate the near requirement—and I say "near requirement" because even the War Powers Resolution qualifies it by saying "in every possible instance"—for prior consultations with Congress before using American forces.

Let me also stress here that, in eliminating the legal requirement for the consultations, I am not suggesting there should be no consultations. On the contrary, such consultations are very desirable and helpful, to both the President and the Congress, whenever they are feasible and can be conducted in a manner consistent with the President's overriding need to avoid jeopardizing the safety of our armed forces.

But this is an age when madmen like Qadhafi have sophisticated weapons which can instantly annihilate large numbers of American military personnel and, regrettably, when almost every word uttered in the deepest secrecy on Capitol Hill ends up shortly thereafter on the evening news and in the morning paper. In this environment, like it or not, we simply cannot undermine the President's ability to act against terrorism by requiring him in every case to thrash out with some or all of 535 Congressmen the details of sensitive antiterrorist military operations before they are underway.

EXTENDS PERIOD FOR PRESIDENTIAL REPORT

The bill would also supersede the War Powers Resolution in a second way—but, again, only when the issue at hand is terrorism—by extending to 10 days—from the resolution's 48 hours—the time during which the President would have to report to Congress on action taken pursuant to the authority outlined in the bill. That additional time would provide the opportunity for a more comprehensive, useful report.

NO ARBITRARY TIME LIMITS

Finally, contrary to the 60- and 90-day limits of the War Powers Resolution, the bill would not put any time limit on the President's use of forces in a terrorist situation. It would be my presumption that use of this authority, in situations such as we have just seen in Libya, would almost always be for operations of very short duration, well under any 60- or 90-day timeframe. But prudence dictates, to me at least, that we not build in any artificial limits on the President's flexibility to do what is necessary, when it is necessary.

THE CHALLENGE OF TERRORISM

Mr. President, international terrorism is one of the most serious challenges which confronts our Nation and our President. To deal effectively with it, the President needs two things above all else. First, he needs the clear and indisputable authority to strike at terrorism and terrorists with his full powers as Commander in Chief. This bill will reaffirm unequivocally that he has that authority.

Second, he needs the political support of the Congress and the people of the United States in doing what must be done. Passage of this bill will make it clear to everyone, everywhere—friend and foe alike—that our President has that political support.

Mr. President, I urge all of my colleagues to join with Senator DENTON and me in passing this bill promptly and decisively.

Mr. President, as an original cosponsor of the War Powers Act of 1970, with Senator Javits, I ask my colleagues to take a look at the debates and report on the War Powers Act. I do not think we ever dealt with state international terrorism. In 1970 and 1973 when the War Powers Act was passed, that was not a matter of great concern. Terrorism had been around for a long time but it was not concentrated, widespread, or state sponsored.

Mr. President, in effect what we seek to do, is to clarify the President's authority to make certain the President will be able to respond to an act of terrorism without a long consultation with Members of Congress, and that it will not in any way compromise our efforts or compromise the security of the American forces.

Earlier in my statement, I outlined what I believe to be a number of areas of concern. We are not trying to give the President new authority. The authority is limited to acts of international terrorism. The bill will outline what an act of terrorism is. It defines who may be participating in terrorism, whether it is a group, whether it is an individual, or whether it may be a government that is involved.

So I hope my colleagues on both sides of the aisle will have an opportunity to take a look at this bill. It is not partisan. It is nonpartisan; and I hope that we could have a number of cosponsors, Republicans and Democrats. I will be joining Senator DENTON in writing my colleagues a note to outline the provisions.

I am hoping that later today the bill can be introduced and jointly referred to Foreign Relations and Judiciary but that has not been cleared by the distinguished minority leader. I will do that later.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point, followed by a fact sheet.

There being no objection, the bill and fact sheet were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2335

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.— The Congress finds and declares that terrorsim is—

(1) a form of aggression which results in the killing of innocent persons, the loss of civil liberties through intimidation and coercion, or the loss of property;

(2) a form of aggression that has as its goal the furtherance of a political or ideological objective by violent means;

(3) directed against the orderly and democratic conduct and security of all people;

(4) a threat to the national security and national interests of the United States;

(5) a threat to the safety of all United States persons; and

(6) a threat to the continued and effective operation of the Government of the United States.

(b) PURPOSES.—It is the purpose of this Act—

(1) to protect United States persons from terrorism; and

(2) to grant the President under appropriate circumstances the authority to punish terrorists or terrorist organizations for acts committed against United States persons.

SEC. 3. DEFINITIONS.

For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "terrorism" means activity, directed against United States persons, which—

(A) is committed by an individual who is not a national or permanent resident alien of the United States;

(B) involves violent acts or acts dangerous to human life which would be a criminal violation if committed within the jurisdiction of the United States; and

(C) is intended—

(i) to intimidate or coerce a civilian population;

(ii) to influence the policy of a government by intimidation or coercion; or

(iii) to affect the conduct of a government by assassination or kidnaping;

(2) the terms "terrorist" and "terrorist organization" mean an individual, group, or any combination thereof which are involved in an act of terrorism;

(3) the term "national of the United States" means—

(A) a natural person who is a citizen of the United States or a natural person (other than an alien) who, though not a citizen of the United States, owes permanent allegiance to the United States; or

(B) a corporation or other entity which is organized under the laws of the United States, if natural persons (described in subparagraph (A)) own, directly or indirectly, more than 50 percent of the outstanding capital stock or other beneficial interest in such legal entity;

(4) the term "United States" means the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, and any other territory or possession of the United States; and

(5) the term "United States person" means any individual, organization, corporation, or entity which is either a permanent resident alien or national of the United States or subject to its domestic jurisdiction.

SEC. 4. OFFENSE OF TERORISM.

(a) OFFENSE.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, whoever organizes, attempts, commits, procures, or supports the commission of an act of terrorism shall be considered to have committed an act of aggression against the United States and may be pursued with deadly force.

(b) AUTHORIZATION OF PRESIDENTIAL ACTION.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law and except as provided in subsection (d), the President is authorized to undertake actions to protect United States persons against terrorists and terrorist activity through the use of all such anti-terrorism and counter-terrorism measures as he deems necessary.

(c) DURATION OF AUTHORITY.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, subsection (b) shall apply—

(1) to all terrorists wherever they may be; and

(2) until such time as the President determines that no terrorist poses a threat to United States persons.

(d) CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATION.—The authority granted to the President under this Act may be exercised in the United States only in accordance with the provisions of the United States Constitution.

(e) INTERPRETATION.—Nothing in this Act may be construed as granting any authority to use deadly force within the United States which authority would not exist in the absence of this Act.

SEC. 5. REPORT.

The President shall submit a report to the Congress not later than 10 days after the President takes any action under section 4(b). The report shall describe in detail the terrorist threat or terrorist act which justified such action.

FACT SHEET ON TERRORISM BILL

ELEMENTS OF THE BILL

Defines terrorism as an act of aggression by a foreigner, aimed at U.S. citizens and corporations, with the purpose of influencing our policy.

Gives the President clear-cut authority to deal with specific acts of terrorism with all appropriate means, including deadly force.

Gives the President authority to act to preempt as well as respond to specific acts of terrorism.

Makes clear terrorists include not only actual "bomb throwers" but also those who organize, lead, fund and support terrorists.

Requires the President to report to Congress within ten days of utilizing his authority, specifying in detail the terrorist threat or terrorist act that justified his action.

Supercedes the War Powers Resolution by: (1) imposing no time limit, such as the 60 and 90 day time limits in the resolution, on the President's use of force in a terrorist situation; (2) requiring no prior consultation with Congress; (3) and extending the reporting period from 48 hours to 10 days.

PROTECTIONS IN THE BILL

Limits the authority to terrorist situations.

Insures, through the reporting requirement, that the authority will be used only to combat specific acts of terror.

Does not expand the President's traditional powers to conduct foreign policy—only to react to terrorism.

Applies only to acts by foreigners and has no impact on the rights of Americans.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise today to voice my strong support for the "Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986," which I am pleased to cosponsor together with the distinguished majority leader from Kansas. I congratulate Senator DOLE for his leadership in introducing this important legislation, which I believe is an essential factor in the continuing development of a comprehensive U.S. policy to combat international terrorism.

Mr. President, a consistent thrust of mine as a Senator has been to develop improvements in the credibility of the United States ability to act promptly against terrorism with unity of resolve and proper regard for the separation of powers within our Government. Terrorism can be discouraged only if would-be terrorists believe that the President of the United States has the power to take appropriate action promptly, with the backing of the Congress, irrespective of the political party of the President or the party in majority in either House of Congress.

In this regard, I believe that this bill is one of the most important introduced since I have been in the Senate. The bill defines terrorism as an act of aggression against the United States, thereby triggering the President's authority as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, to pursue terrorists with deadly force, if necessary. As such, the bill does not create new authority for the President, but rather, as Senator DOLE has so eloquently stated, clarifies the extent of the President's authority to deal with terrorism.

Such clarification is absolutely necessary in view of the second guessing frequently engaged in by some Members of Congress and the media which clouds the President's existing authority to order military strikes when necessary to prevent terrorist attacks on Americans. Even now, in the wake of the strike conducted against Libya this week, we hear expressions of doubt about the President's authority to take such action. The bill introduced today will ensure that the President does not speak with an empty voice in acting against terrorism. This unfortunately has been the practice in the past on occasion when 535 Secretaries of State undercut foreign policy decisions which the Chief Executive sought to implement.

I believe that prompt enactment of the "Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986" will demonstrate that we are finally on the road to developing an effective policy against terrorism. For far too long, United States policy toward terrorism has been fragmented, reactive, defensive and ad hoc, dealing with each incident as though it were an isolated occurrence, entirely unrelated to other terrorist acts. This approach has ignored the voluminous record developed by the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism.

Over the past 5 years, the subcommittee has held numerous hearings on terrorism which have yielded abundant and conclusive evidence of a network, a global unity, in the sources of support, strategy, tactics, and goals of international terrorists. The thrust and power of this network amounts to a new, highly effective form of low intensity warfare which is being waged by various nation-states—including, particularly, Libya, Iran, Syria, North Korea, and Cuba—to erode the influence and strategic position of the United States and Western democracies, in general, and to enhance the power of the Soviet Union, its client states and allies, in particular.

This reservoir of information regarding the global and interrelated nature of terrorist activities has not been tapped sufficiently by the Congress, the public or the executive branch. Thus, our spasmodic and ad hoc policy toward international terrorism has persisted, despite the publicly declared policies and intentions of terrorist groups and the states, such as Libya, which support them.

However, the events of the last several weeks have focused American and European attention as never before on the strategic and operational coordination of international terrorists. Despite protestations to the contrary by Qadhafi, United States and European intelligence services were able to confirm that the terrorist attack on the West Berlin disco received support, encouragement, and direction from Libya and other sponsors of international terrorism outside Germany.

Presented with such intelligence, the President must be able to act quickly to prevent a terrorist attack, if possible. If prevention is not possible in a given case, the President must act to punish, while the gun is still smoking, the terrorist group or groups involved and the nation-states which have facilitated their criminal acts. The bill introduced today will make it clear that the President is authorized to take such actions, and that we in the Congress stand behind him.

In addition to defining terrorism and clarifying the President's powers to deal with terrorists, the bill's definition of "terrorists" and "terrorist organizations" would cover not only the individuals and groups who actually perpetrate an act of terrorism, but also the leaders of a state which organizes or supports the act. The bill makes any offense of terrorism committed against a U.S. person an act of aggression against the United States, itself, which may be pursued with deadly force.

Finally, in order to protect Congress' oversight responsibility, the bill requires the President to submit a report to the Congress within 10 days after the President takes any action under the bill against terrorists or terrorist activity.

The "Anti-Terrorism Act of 1986" is landmark legislation which could at least cause the tide of terrorism to ebb. Its enactment will demonstrate to terrorists that Congress and the American people are solidly united in supporting prompt action by the President to prevent terrorist acts and punish terrorists. The act will evidence, as well, the growing consensus in this country which is helping to develop a sound and consistent U.S. policy against terrorism.

I urge my colleagues to support prompt consideration and passage of this legislation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on this side we ran the hot line about changing the time for the vote and there were no responses. I took that to mean that there would not be any problems. I now learn that a Senator has called to say he can be here and vote at 11 or 1, but cannot be here at 12. Will the distinguished majority leader review this matter and see if that vote could be changed?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. President, before the distinguished majority leader leaves the floor, I think his statement earlier was clear enough but I want to be sure that I understood it. I believe the distinguished majority leader indicated there definitely would not be any rollcall votes tomorrow. Am I correct?

Mr. DOLE. That is correct.

Mr. BYRD. Does the distinguished majority leader contemplate a session tomorrow?

Mr. DOLE. I am not certain of that, but I will give that information. I am certain there will be no rollcall votes tomorrow.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the minority leader is recognized.

ACTION ON THE BUDGET RESOLUTION

Mr. BYRD. On several occasions I have stated the feeling that the budget resolution should be called up and debated on this floor and that there should not be further delay.

There are many reasons, Mr. President, for avoiding further delay. One important consideration has been brought to my attention. I had the opportunity to meet on Tuesday with a group of presidents from colleges and universities around the country, including one or more in my own State. These were both large and small institutions. They warned me of the concerns which delay in acting on the budget will occasion.

Mr. Joseph Murphy of the City University of New York put it to me succinctly: "While nothing happens, something bad happens." That "something bad" is the uncertainty in which students all around the country are finding themselves because they do not know what to plan in terms of student aid.

This is the time of the year when students make decisions about attending colleges and universities next fall. Delay in making decisions about the level of Federal support for student aid programs could affect hundreds of thousands of students nationwide. Some students, faced with this uncertainty, may plan a course of part-time instruction rather than full time. Worst of all, some students may decide to forgo college entirely because of the lack of certainty that aid will even be available. And this is true for many students who will need to depend on a Pell grant.

It is not only the students who are put into this state of uncertainty by failure to produce a budget; counselors in high schools are also unable to advise students on the wise course of action concerning their college plans, and financial aid officers in the colleges and universities are unable to plan for the coming term.

We know that the President's draconian budget cuts in higher education programs are dead. The President's budget was rejected in the House. In the Senate it was rejected in the committee. But what do we do? I was told in this meeting to which I have referred that 70 percent of the Pell grants in West Virginia, indeed a similar amount nationwide I was told, have been affected by the Gramm-Rudman legislation.

If the Senate does not get to work on a responsible budget, we may see even deeper cuts for next year. Students in West Virginia and around the country need to know what the Senate and the House will do about the student aid on which they desperately depend for their education.

The bipartisan budget reported by the Budget Committee is more responsible in the area of education than the President's budget—which has already been rejected—or the Gramm-Rudman language. But I believe even more can be done. I will support amendments to achieve a proper funding level because I believe that education is an integral component of our national defense. But until the Senate begins work on the budget, we cannot offer such amendments, and the students of West Virginia and the Nation will continue to be left in the dark.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Presiding Officer.

Does the Senator from Illinois wish to have additional time?

Mr. DIXON. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield the remaining 4 minutes to Mr. DIXON which, if he does not use, if he would in turn yield it to another Senator. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR DIXON

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON] is recognized for not to exceed 9 minutes.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader for his generosity and hope to not use the entire amount of time allotted to me.

THE IMPENDING READINESS AND SUSTAINABILITY GAP

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the Preparedness Subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee has been holding hearings on the fiscal year 1987 Defense budget. As the ranking member of this subcommittee, I felt that certain information regarding the military services readiness and the effects of the administration's 1987 budget should be brought to the attention of my colleagues.

There is no doubt that we have significantly improved the readiness and sustainability of our military forces over the last 5 years. Flying hours and steaming days are up. Backlogs of equipment overdue for overhaul have shrunk. Ammunition stocks have increased. Perhaps most importantly, recruitment and retention of high quality personnel in the military services have reached extremely high levels.

Mr. President, these gains are being placed in jeopardy by this year's budget. My overall conclusion is that the fiscal year 1987 Defense budget submitted by the President is seriously out of balance. It disproportionately emphasizes procurement of new weapons systems and seriously underfunds the spare parts, repair parts, and munitions necessary to make these new weapons capable of sustained operations in time of war. No one wants to return to the days when a lack of spare parts and ammunition reduced our overall military capability, but that is where we are headed if we enact this budget.

Let me take a few moments to show why I think this is the case.

The fiscal year 1987 Defense budget before us today is $42.4 billion below the level anticipated for fiscal year 1987 last year when the President submitted his fiscal year 1986 budget. At the same time, however, we must remember that today the administration's fiscal year 1987 Defense budget still represents significant real growth over the fiscal year 1986 level enacted by Congress last year—4 percent growth over the fiscal year 1986 enacted level, and approximately 8 percent real growth over the fiscal year 1986 sequester level.

I think it is important to look at how the Pentagon cut this $42.4 billion from the fiscal year 1987 level projected in last year's fiscal year 1986 budget to the fiscal year 1987 budget we have before us today.

Almost two-thirds of this $42.4 billion—$26.6 billion, or 63 percent—came out of the procurement accounts. Some of us have been saying for a number of years that we have been spending too much on modernization in the procurement accounts and not enough on readiness and sustainability in the Operations and Maintenance accounts. But it is important to remember that the procurement accounts make a very critical contribution to readiness and sustainability through the funding of spare parts and ammunition.

Now, how did DOD cut the fiscal year 1987 procurement budget by $26.6 billion from what they were projecting last year? The answer, unfortunately, is by going right to those areas of the procurement budget that make a direct and immediate contribution to readiness and sustainability.

Major combat systems—combat aircraft, tanks, surface combatants, and submarines—were not cut from the fiscal year 1987 column of the fiscal year 1986 budget to the fiscal year 1987 budget request. For example, even with a $42.4 billion reduction from the projected fiscal year 1987 level last year to the fiscal year 1987 budget request this year, including a $26.6 billion or 22 percent reduction in the procurement accounts, DOD is still requesting 7 percent more combat aircraft in fiscal year 1987 than they projected for fiscal year 1987 last year. Comparing combat aircraft scheduled for procurement in 1986 and 1987, there is nearly a 11-percent increase over last year.

What was cut in this fiscal year 1987 budget from the fiscal year 1987 level projected last year were trainer aircraft, spare parts, repair parts, and munitions, both high technical "smart" munitions like air-to-air and air-to-ground missiles and conventional munitions like artillery rounds.

Almost $11 billion of the $26.6 billion cut in the fiscal year 1987 procurement accounts from last year's projected level to this year's budget request were in spare parts and support equipment and conventional ammunition. The result, Mr. Chairman, is that in many of the critical readiness and sustainability areas, the fiscal year 1987 budget request is below the fiscal year 1986 enacted level, despite the fact that the fiscal year 1987 defense budget represents 4 percent real growth, and 8 percent total growth, over the fiscal year 1986 enacted level.

Let me briefly focus on two areas.

SPARE PARTS

I have included a chart which shows three columns of spare parts funding in each of the military services: The fiscal year 1986 enacted level; the fiscal year 1987 level projected last year; and the current fiscal year 1987 request. I ask unanimous consent that this chart be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AIRCRAFT SPARE PARTS FUNDING

[In millions of dollars]

	Fiscal year 1986 enacted	Fiscal year 1987 column of fiscal year 1986 request	Fiscal year 1987 request
Army	814.3	1,198.3	710.5
Navy	1,259.1	2,273.3	1,856.1
Air Force	3,811.1	6,035.7	3,477.9

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, in all three services there is a very substantial reduction from what they said last year they would need in fiscal year 1987, to what they are requesting this year for fiscal year 1987. The fiscal year 1987 spare parts budget requests for the Army and Air Force are actually below the fiscal year 1986 enacted level, despite the fact that aircraft flying hours in these two services are projected to increase from fiscal year 1986 to 1987.

Next, I want to discuss an Air Force funding chart for aircraft replenishment spare parts. According to this chart, which I ask unanimous consent be printed at this point in the RECORD, we funded 100 percent of the Air Force's replenishment spare parts requirements in fiscal year 1985, and 71 percent in fiscal year 1986. But the current budget request meets only 56 percent of the Air Force fiscal year 1987 replenishment spare parts requirement and 58 percent of the fiscal year 1988 requirement. The Air Force will never be able to sustain air combat operations in wartime if we keep this up.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AIR FORCE REPLENISH SPARE PARTS

[Dollar amounts in millions]

	Fiscal year
	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987	1988
Requirement	$5,215	$4,531	$3,907	$4,052	$4,542	$6,096
Program	$2,587	$3,304	$3,907
1987 Parts budget				$2,873	$2,550	$3,547
Percent	50	73	100	71	56	58

MUNITIONS

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I also want to touch on ammunition, both conventional munitions and high-tech, "smart" munitions.

I have a chart showing trends in Army ammunition procurement. This chart compares the fiscal year 1986-90 and fiscal year 1987-91 5-year defense plan figures for the procurement of ammunition, Army account, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROCUREMENT OF AMMUNITION ARMY ACCOUNT

[In millions of dollars]

	Fiscal year—
	1985	1986	1987	1988	1989	1990	1991
Fiscal year 1986-90: President's budget	2,646.3	2,635.0	3,051.1	4,483.3	4,772.5	5,457.9
Fiscal year 1987-91: President's budget	2,500.3	2,497.2	2,254.0	2,424.0	2,289.9	2,337.4	2,398.7
Difference		−137.8	−797.1	−2,059.3	−2,482.6	−3,120.5

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, last year, the 5-year defense plan projected a steady growth in this account through fiscal year 1990. This year, however, the fiscal year 1987 request is $800 million below last year's fiscal year 1987 projection, and $243 million, or 10 percent, below the fiscal year 1986 enacted level. The current 5-year funding line is flat—we do not even get back to the fiscal year 1985 level by fiscal year 1991, despite the fact that the current 5-year defense plan includes an average of 3 percent real growth after inflation for each year of the next 5 years for the defense budget as a whole.

I have another chart which summarizes war reserve munitions funding in the military services from fiscal years 1984 to 1987, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point. In two services, the Army and the Navy, the fiscal year 1987 budget requests less funding for war reserve munitions than was enacted in fiscal year 1986. We are buying more combat aircraft than we planned, and less munitions than we planned.

There being no objection, the chart is ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FUNDING FOR WAR RESERVE MUNITIONS

[In millions of dollars]

	Fiscal year—
	1984	1985	1986	1987
Army	1,198	1,702	1,376	1,313
Navy	2,770	3,507	3,622	2,982
Marine Corps	575	614	518	608
Air Force	1,423	1,771	2,172	3,320

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, in our hearings with the commanders of the Unified and Specified Commands this year, all of the CINC's emphasized that improving their ammunition sustainability remains one of their top priorities. Mr. President, I was shocked last week to hear Army officials testify that under the current 5-year defense plan, the Army's days of supply of modern conventional ammunition would increase for the next 2 fiscal years and then drop by fiscal year 1991 almost back to where we are today.

The news in the area of sophisticated "smart" munitions is not much better. I ask unanimous consent that a table on funding for these munitions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOPHISTICATED MUNITIONS

[Missiles, torpedoes, etc., comparison of procurement plans, last year's 5-year plan versus this year's 5-year plan, fiscal year 1987-90]

	Fiscal year—		Reduction	Percent reduction
	1986 plan	1987 plan
Army	127,301	91,405	−35,896	−28
Navy	49,721	37,238	−12,483	−25
Air Force	54,715	42,681	−12,034	−22
Total	231,737	171,324	−60,413	−26

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, comparing the fiscal year 1986 5-year defense plan submitted last year with the fiscal year 1987 plan before us this year, the number of smart munitions to be purchased over the 4 common years of the two plans has been cut by 28 percent in the Army, 25 percent in the Navy, and 22 percent in the Air Force. These are the munitions we are relying on to give our forces the qualitative edge to offset the numerical advantages the Soviet Union and Warsaw Pact nations have in areas such as tanks and aircraft. Stretchouts of this magnitude clearly increase the risk we face should war come anytime in the next 5 years.

Mr. President, funding for spare parts and for ammunition are two of the most critical areas of our readiness and sustainability. All of the material I have cited this afternoon comes from DOD's own budget justification materials.

There is no question in my mind that the fiscal year 1987 budget as submitted has a strong bias against readiness and sustainability. If the imbalances in this budget are not corrected, we will soon begin to see readiness indicators turning down as a result of spare parts shortages.

In conclusion, the cold, hard reality is that Congress is not going to provide the full level of funding for the Defense Department that the President has requested in his fiscal year 1987 budget. Whatever level of funding for the Defense Department is provided in fiscal year 1987, it is absolutely critical that it maintain the appropriate balance between funding for new weapons and funding for readiness and sustainability. The challenge we face over the next several months in the Congress is to restore this balance, while still bringing down the overall level of defense spending in fiscal year 1987.

I thank the President and I yield the remainder of whatever time I have remaining to my distinguished friend from New Mexico.

How much time do we have remaining, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has no time remaining.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR ROCKEFELLER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ROCKEFELLER] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. I thank the Chair.

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL COMPETITIVENESS REPORT

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, today, along with 30 Democratic and Republican cosponsors, I am introducing a joint resolution requiring the President to report to Congress on his response to the recommendations of his Commission on Industrial Competitiveness, sometimes known as the Young Commission.

We offer this vital resolution because the Young Commission did some vital work for this Nation of ours, the importance of which has been basically unrecognized by both the President and Congress. And we offer this resolution to help provide a catalyst for a serious national debate on the competitiveness of our economy, which is fundamental to our country's future economic prosperity.

President Reagan appointed the Young Commission in June 1983, calling attention to the new reality of global competition faced by American industry at home and abroad. He called for recommendations on ways to improve the Nation's ability to compete, and he selected a commission of 30 distinguished Americans from business, labor, government, academia, and the public. He selected John Young, chairman of Hewlett-Packard, one of our premier industrialists, to chair the Commission.

The Young Commission studied the global economy for 15 months and reported unanimously in January 1985, just over a year ago. The Commission has given us an unflinching picture of where we are and where we must go. Their report can be a focal point for a national debate and the foundation on which to build a new consensus for needed policies. The report is persuasive because it is the work of a blue-ribbon commission, representing a diversity of interests, with no partisan ax to grind. And it is persuasive because it irrefutably summarizes and reaffirms the evidence with which we are becoming so familiar:

The American economy has become fully integrated in a world economy. Fully 70 percent of the goods we produce compete with merchandise from abroad. We, however, have not adjusted to the new world economy as effectively as some of our competitors, most notably Japan and the other Pacific Rim nations.

Our problems are not confined to one region, or to only our basic industries. Our productivity growth has been outstripped by virtually all our competitors across the full board. Fully half the jobs in the U.S. steel industry have disappeared since 1979. People know that. But we also have lost market share in all the high technology or "sunrise" industries. Our electronics trade deficit with Japan approached the magnitude of our deficit in autos; we fell into deficit in telecommunications where we have always been the world's pacesetter.

While macroeconomic problems, notably an overvalued dollar, bear some of the blame for America's competitive problems, they don't explain everything. The dollar was lower valued in the 1970's, but our trade deficit increased. The value of the dollar cannot be blamed for our slow productivity growth, stagnant wages, or high capital costs.

Nor can the deterioration in American manufacturing be comfortably dismissed by the claim that we are becoming a service economy. Services and manufacturing are often inextricably linked. If the United States loses competitiveness in manufactured goods, it risks losing position in supporting services. If other companies, notably Japanese, dominate complex manufacturing, it is naive to believe that they will rely on our financial services, lawyers, or advertising agencies.

We have neglected investments in areas fundamental to our economic future: The education and training crucial for a skilled and adaptable work force, and the requisite level of science and technology needed to keep us at the cutting edge of competition.

In short, the Young Commission concluded:

> Our ability to compete internationally faces unprecedented challenge from abroad. Our world leadership is at stake, and so is our ability to provide for our people the standard of living and opportunities to which they aspire.

The Young Commission then offered a series of thoughtful proposals for government and private action: To better create, apply, and protect new technology; increase the supply of productive capital; develop a more skilled, flexible, and motivated work force and make trade a national priority.

In my view, meeting the challenge of a competitive world is the central economic issue of our time. The economic dominance that produced the prosperity of the 1950's and 1960's for our country is gone, and it will not be returning. We have to build our future prosperity in a world where many talented nations compete effectively. The old habits and old policies will not suffice for our new situation.

President Reagan points with understandable pride to the long-running recovery coupled with low inflation. But the fundamental measure of our economic condition in a world economy is our trade picture. Our trade deficit hit $148 billion last year. We can't go on like that. A nation that buys $3 billion more from abroad each week than it sells is draining its economic strength.

Some may argue that the recent run of economic good news—particularly the sharp decline in oil prices and the dollar—have made any competitiveness problems our country might have a thing of the past. They are wrong. I certainly agree that the drop in oil prices should have the effect of stimulating economic growth, and that the reduction of the value of the dollar is welcome—indeed, long overdue—and indispensable for our industries to compete at home and abroad. Treasury Secretary Baker deserves great credit for reversing the administration's policy of stunning indifference to the damage that the overvalued dollar was doing to our industries, and for taking the lead in international efforts to bring the dollar down to earth.

Since the overvalued dollar has been a major factor in driving American manufacturers offshore, keeping the dollar at a reasonable level should help keep American manufacturing and jobs here at home. If interest rates stay relatively low, it should provide an attractive incentive for investment in plant and equipment that will make our industries more productive. All of us hope that the good economic news can help produce what the U.S. News & World Report has euphorically described as "the brave new economy." My State of West Virginia, still not recovered from the recession of 1981-82, desperately needs the economic recovery to continue, and extend its impact to some of our hard-hit basic industries.

But if our country is fortunate enough to be in a period where the macroeconomic news is good, we should be wise enough to make this a period of opportunity, not complacency. It is a period of time for recognizing the scope of the competitive challenge and for building consensus behind policies that will allow us to secure our competitive future. Lower interest rates, oil prices, and the price of the dollar do not make up for the way we have neglected crucial investments in education and training, research and development, science and technology.

The quality of our education system is fundamental to our economic destiny. We will not long sustain a world-class economy without a world-class education system, and at the elementary and secondary school levels, we have fallen behind, not only Japan, but many nations—friend and foe. In my State, there is a teacher shortage in math and science in 30 of the 55 counties.

Because of demographics, the next few years are the critical window of opportunity for revitalizing our education system. Within the next decade, nearly 800,000 new teachers will be needed. Will those retiring be replaced by the best and the brightest, drawn to an exciting and rewarding profession that our country esteems—and pays—the way it should? Many of our States and localities are making great efforts to lift their education systems. The policies we enact in Washington; the critical investments we make; and the message we are prepared to send about the importance of education—these can all play a fundamental part in determining if we have a surge of excellence in education, rather than succumbing to the "tide of mediocrity" which the President's Education Commission identified in 1982.

For years, we have led the world in science and technology, but fallen short in translating our breakthroughs into new products and advances in manufacturing. The VCR and robotics were invented in the United States; today not a single VCR is manufactured here, and we are far behind Japan in robotics. But even as we wrestle with that problem, which is fundamental to our industrial competitiveness, a National Science Board report recently noted that our leadership in science and technology was in severe jeopardy, owing to inadequate laboratory instruction and equipment, shortages of qualified faculty, and outdated curriculum.

Finally, we have to make a concerted effort to put in place the policies—tax, trade, investment—that can keep the United States a country where it is possible to manufacture competitively. The recent Business Week feature entitled, "The Hollow Corporation," paints a stunning picture of just how much of our manufacturing base has been liquidated in the past few years. In many cases, American companies have gone abroad in search of cheap labor to compete; in some cases, they have been in search of skilled labor no longer available here. To a shocking degree, many of our corporations—including names like RCA, Kodak, Caterpillar and Hewlett-Packard—have begun to operate, not by competing with Japan or Korea, but by distributing sophisticated products made in those countries.

It may be sound strategy for each of the corporations involved, but taken collectively, it risks disaster for our country's economic future. World economic leadership will reside in the countries that have the science and engineering, the technology, and the skilled and educated work force to make advances in manufacturing: new products and new processes. We are not going to be prosperous very long as the advertisers, retailers, and consumers of sophisticated products made overseas.

Mr. President, I am convinced that the people of our country understand the competitiveness challenge—and the stakes—far better than our political leadership does. State governments are working to improve schools; corporations are restructuring to compete; labor and management are pulling together to improve productivity. I find understanding, recognition, and deep concern whenever I speak about these issues—whether the audience is the successful entrepreneurs of the American Business Conference, or the cross section of interested West Virginians at one of my town meetings back home. We owe it to our people to level with them about the full nature of the challenge, the costs of meeting it, and the consequences of failing.

The resolution we offer today is intended to help spur the debate. Some have said that as a nation, we are incapable of acting in response to the competitiveness challenge until we hit a crisis. Frankly, I do not believe that is true. If the President, with his great communications skills and popularity, chose to speak to the Nation about the competitiveness challenge, he could make it a national priority overnight. Because he has not, the rest of us in leadership positions will have to work much harder to get the message out.

We should recognize that there will never be a day when the crisis arrives. It does not work that way. There was no one day when Great Britain awoke to discover that its competitiveness and its standard of living were declining. Rather, it was a gradual deterioration over many years, eventually resulting in second-rate economic status for the nation. Some of that deterioration has taken place here already; it will continue to take place unless we dedicate ourselves to reversing it. But we have great assets as a nation, and with a concerted effort, we can insure a bright economic future for our country and our people.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 327

To provide for the President to report on the status and implementation of the recommendations of the President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness.

Whereas the President has relied upon nonpartisan commissions in an effort to inform or build a national consensus on such diverse issues as Central American policy, Social Security, strategic missile basing, waste and abuse in defense purchasing, and a host of other national priorities;

Whereas in June 1983, to help build public awareness and a consensus about the policies needed to secure the future economic prosperity of the Nation, the President appointed a Commission on Industrial Competitiveness, composed of distinguished representatives of business, labor, government, academia, and the public;

Whereas in January 1985, the Commission reported and unanimously found that the ability of the United States to compete internationally faces unprecedented challenge from abroad;

Whereas the Commission unanimously found that the United States productivity growth lags far behind that of foreign competitors, real hourly compensation of the national work force is no longer improving, United States leadership in world trade is declining, and pre-tax return on assets invested in manufacturing discourage investment in this vital core of the economy;

Whereas the Commission unanimously recommended an economic agenda for the Nation for this decade and beyond, including policies and practices that seek to strengthen the national competitive performance in the creation application and protection of technology, the reduction in the cost of capital to United States industry, the development of a more skilled, flexible, and motivated work force, and the better coordination of trade policy;

Whereas the Commission unanimously found that the United States must take on the challenge of competitiveness as the economic agenda for the next decade;

Whereas the Commission unanimously found that the government should take the lead in highlighting the importance of competitiveness and should nurture an effective consensus-building dialogue among leaders in industry, labor, government, and academia; and

Whereas the Commission unanimously found that the United States world leadership is at stake, including the ability to provide for the standard of living and opportunity which is aspired to by the people of the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President shall report to the Congress on the status of the recommendations of the President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness and future plans for implementation, no later than the later of August 1, 1986, or sixty days after the date of enactment of this joint resolution.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BINGAMAN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BINGAMAN] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Thank you, Mr. President.

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL COMPETITIVENESS REPORT

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I am happy to speak this morning in support of Senate Joint Resolution 327. And I commend the distinguished junior Senator from West Virginia for his leadership in introducing this joint resolution today.

At a time when we are especially concerned for our national military security, this legislation focuses on an equally important threat to our national economic security.

President Reagan's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness, which was chaired by John Young of Hewlett Packard and comprised of distinguished leaders from business, labor, education, and Government, reported over 15 months ago that "our world leadership is at stake, and so is our ability to provide for our people the standard of living and opportunity to which they aspire." The threat, according to the President's Commission, comes from the unprecedented emergence of strong foreign economic competition.

The President has done virtually nothing in the 15 months since the Commission unanimously called on America to grasp the challenge of this competition and to make it the primary economic agenda for the next decade. Despite a declining dollar, the United States has posted another world record annual trade deficit which continues to worsen month by month. To pay for these foreign made products, the United States has become a net debtor for the first time since we emerged as a major world power in 1914. Borrowing at a rate of over $120 billion year, the United States has already become the world's largest debtor. We have saddled ourselves and our children with enormous future obligations.

Wage rates and living standards are stagnant in real terms and we have 8 million people actively looking for work. U.S. productivity growth is only a fraction of that of our competitors. Business investment in new, commercially productive plant and equipment is extremely low, as 20 percent of our industrial capacity remains idle. Business Week magazine on March 3 issued a lengthy report, which the Senator from West Virginia referred to, entitled "The Hollow Corporation," detailing the long-term damage that is beng done to U.S. economic well-being in the face of the increasingly sophisticated foreign competition.

Clearly, we have a severe, national economic problem which we need to address in a responsible, bipartisan manner. This has been the message of the President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness and at least 20 other recent, blue-ribbon panels of leaders from business, labor, academia, and Government. Just as clearly, however, President Reagan has not given us the national leadership this challenge requires. As Michael E. Porter of the Harvard Business School and member of the President's Commission, states in the current Fortune magazine, "The President received the Commission's report politely and turned to other business." I ask that a copy of this article be inserted in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, our resolution will help focus administration attention and lay the groundwork for a useful dialog with Congress. The resolution requires the President to report to the Congress on activities he has taken and intends to take on the recommendations of the Commission.

The resolution introduced here today is the first of what I hope will be many important initiatives growing out of the efforts of the recently created Senate Democratic Working Group on Economic Competitiveness. In late December last year, Senate Democratic Leader ROBERT BYRD appointed the working group, on which I am proud to serve as chairman. The other members of the group are Senators BAUCUS, BYRD, KERRY, LEVIN, MATSUNAGA, MOYNIHAN, RIEGLE, and ROCKEFELLER.

Over the past few months, in consultation with numerous outside experts, we have examined the competitiveness problem and the hundreds of recommendations that have been proposed by the President's Commission and the 20 other prestigious panels that have looked at this problem. The American character is ideally suited to meet the challenge these reports have spelled out for us. It is Government's unique capability and responsibility, however, to assure that American firms and workers have the tools of education, technology, and capital necessary to get the job done.

Our working group is developing consensus legislation and a leadership strategy which, hopefully with bipartisan and Presidential support, can assure increasing prosperity and economic security for all Americans. Today's legislation is an important step toward the goal.

EXHIBIT 1

(By Michael E. Porter)

WHY U.S. BUSINESS IS FALLING BEHIND

America's inability to compete in world markets, as President Reagan's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness reported just over a year ago, is the most serious challenge facing the U.S. The President received the commission's report politely and then turned to other business. Instead of making international competitiveness the new challenge for America, he has been celebrating the country's supposed comeback.

Yet much evidence leads to the disturbing conclusion that we are in a hollow recovery in which the foundation of future economic growth is being undermined instead of fortified. If one looks beyond the shortest run, the inescapable conclusion is that competitiveness may well be the pivotal economic issue for the rest of this century.

The sustained economic recovery, nine million new jobs, low inflation, and falling interest rates certainly seem encouraging. But a closer look at the performance of the economy suggests a strikingly different conclusion. Measures of underlying competitiveness are getting worse, not better, and the trend is not new.

The U.S. did not have a trade deficit in this century until 1972. The trade deficit has climbed with few interruptions ever since, even when the dollar was widely viewed as undervalued in the late Seventies. Low inflation is a symptom of the competitiveness problem, not a sign of success. Inflation is low because oil prices are falling and because of competitive pressure on U.S. industry. Price increases have become an endangered species.

Is job creation a good indicator of economic health? Some 168,000 jobs were lost in manufacturing last year. The vast majority of the new jobs in the U.S. have been in construction and in services such as retailing, wholesaling, finance, and government. These jobs, in areas not exposed to international competition, provide little comfort.

Interest rates have been cut in half since the recovery began, another contributor to the feeling of well-being. Falling interest rates have led to rising corporate indebtedness, but not to the sustained capital investment they were supposed to foster. Over 90% of the growth in capital spending since 1979 went for automobiles and office machinery, not production equipment. Orders for plants and equipment have been falling since last September.

Instead of investing at home, U.S. companies are stampeding offshore. Caterpillar, for example, now makes or buys well over 50% of its components and finished products abroad. U.S. companies are becoming second-class manufacturers and many are giving up instead of doing something about it.

Among the most straightforward measures of U.S. industrial competitiveness is inflation-adjusted wages. Real wages grew steadily from World War II until 1973. Since then they have fallen and the trend is still downward. In real terms average gross weekly earnings are at 1962 levels.

Most ominous of all, productivity growth has come to a halt. Productivity has risen less in this recovery than in any other since World War II, and it declined last year. Productivity growth is vital because it ultimately determines wages, profits, and living standards. The U.S. no longer is the world's most productive nation in several industries, including autos and machine tools, and the productivity gap is widening rapidly.

Unfortunately, the competitiveness problem does not fit the President's economic vision. The Administration seems to believe that U.S. industry is still preeminent. It preaches that current difficulties will be solved simply by getting government off the back of business and making a few adjustments in interest rates and the exchange value of the dollar.

The Administration also seems to believe that the mere acknowledgement of a problem is the first step to greater government intervention in the economy, something it vehemently opposes. It seems convinced that even a discussion of the issue will open the door to an avalanche of wrong-headed policies.

Congress, meanwhile, votes for protectionist measures as the way to help businesses and workers that are losing out to foreign competitors. But Congress also has missed the point. The U.S. cannot solve its problems through protectionism or by opening up the Japanese market. Americans buy Japanese goods not just because they are cheap, but because many are more advanced and better made. The almost pathetic efforts of Japanese buying delegations to find U.S. products to take home illustrates the real problem. What did the Japanese come up with after scouring the U.S.? Oranges, wine, fondue sets, and air fresheners.

Timber, coal, and agricultural products may respond to the falling dollar. But important exports and imports such as machine tools, consumer electronics, and automobiles are much less price sensitive. A low dollar is not going to cover up lagging technology and inferior quality.

The U.S. will not solve the competitiveness problem until it again becomes the place where the most advanced, highest quality goods and services are produced by the most skilled workers using the most advanced methods. This is the reason the U.S. was the greatest economic power in the Forties, Fifties, and Sixties. The U.S. has no inherent right to the world's highest standard of living. A society must earn what it consumes. I believe that most American consumers, workers, and managers know in their guts that this is true.

Many of the remedies to these problems lie squarely in the private sector. U.S. companies have a lot of catching up to do in training, labor relations, quality control, and the introduction of new technology. Recent efforts are a start but are far from enough. Corporate research and development spending has risen, but spending by Japanese and German companies has risen more. Every manager, every employee, every trade association, and every labor union has a vital role in helping industry become preeminent again in productivity and technology. Business and labor have done themselves a disservice by blaming their troubles on outside forces and asking government to bail them out.

But government also has a role in solving the competitiveness problem. Getting off the back of business is not enough. Companies cannot succeed without the basic tools, the most educated work force, and the premier technological base. These require a social investment in the primary and secondary education system, in universities, in research institutes, and in the scientific establishment. No company or individual can afford to create these things. Government must do so.

The Reagan Administration's greatest failure has been in investing too little in America's future prosperity. It does not recognize that some parts of the social agenda are vital to the economic agenda, just as Democrats often forget that economic success is vital to achieving the social agenda.

Cutting back on education and training to reduce budget deficits is like tearing down the house for firewood. The result is that America does not make the first team compared with other countries in terms of math and science skills. The number of engineering graduates in the U.S. is inadequate. Even the facilities in U.S. schools and universities are subpar.

Federal civilian research has fallen in real terms since 1981, just as America has lost its technological lead in many areas. Total federal spending on research, including military outlays, was only 1.2% of GNP last year vs. 2.2% in 1964. Other nations spend a much higher percentage of GNP on civilian technology. We cannot forgo investment in human resources and technology in the name of budget cutting without sacrificing long-term economic growth.

The Federal Government also has lost its focus on capital investment, the third key ingredient of competitiveness. The tax reform legislation before the Senate will penalize investment when it is more vital than ever. Washington's ideas about tax reform seem to rest on the shaky hope that companies losing to foreign competitors can somehow pay a larger tax bill without slipping even further behind.

The Federal Government also has proved incapable of making real progress toward unsnarling the international trading system. Both Congress and the executive branch are plagued by overlapping authority and responsibilities in the trade area, the legacy of an era when trade was unimportant and U.S. companies had a commanding lead.

Finally, the U.S. must regain its will to be the best economically. The public and many corporations have developed a bunker mentality. The sense of economic opportunity has been lost, as if all the new products and services have already been invented and all human needs satisfied. Since the Japanese and Koreans make things cheaper, runs this despairing train of thought, America is doomed to a falling standard of living.

The truth is that the U.S. is in a period of unprecedented opportunity driven by technological change that is reshaping old industries and creating new ones. The long-term health of the U.S. economy depends on its ability to lead these developments instead of playing catch-up. The American dream will continue if the country equips itself with the skills and technology it needs and recaptures the will to achieve.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR CHILES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Florida Mr. [CHILES] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

ANNIVERSARY OF YOUNG COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I rise today to join with my distinguished colleagues from West Virginia and New Mexico, and others, in introducing what I think is an important initiative. I congratulate them for the work that they have done, the Senator from West Virginia, in being the prime sponsor of this, and the Senator from New Mexico, in the work that he is doing on productivity, with the task force that he chairs, with a number of important meetings, and the people that he has been bringing in to talk with a number of us in the Senate from business, from academia, and from many areas in trying to focus on this tremendously important problem.

Over a year has passed since the "Young Commission's Report on Industrial Competitiveness."

In that year, the administration has greeted the report with a resounding silence.

We have seen another passive response by this administration to what is becoming a national economic emergency.

I guess we are getting accustomed to this lack of leadership and action.

We see it in the administration's response to the International Trade Commission's unanimous rulings on our industries damaged by imports.

We see it when the administration fails to enforce existing trade laws against unfair foreign trade barriers.

And now we see it when the President's own blue ribbon panel issues a report which tells us that the very basis for our prosperity is at risk.

Let me remind you how severe our competitive problem has become.

In the first term of this administration, the United States experienced a 27-percent decline in its ability to compete in the world economy.

The fundamental causes of this decline are right here at home. Our productivity growth is lower than that of our trading partners. Our real interest rates are higher than abroad. We invest a smaller proportion of our resources in research and development than our trading partners.

And if anyone thinks things are getting better—just consider that U.S. productivity actually declined in 1985. This is not the path leading to a higher standard of living. This is the path toward the impoverishment of the American people.

Finally, consider that our apparent prosperity of the last few years has been brought with a mountain of debt. In the last 5 years we have gone from the world's largest creditor to its largest debtor. The bottom line is that we are losing our ability to earn our way in the world economy.

As this forum today indicates, we really cannot expect a passive administration to lead the way toward reversing our competitive decline. We in Congress must take the lead—and I am glad to see this is a bipartisan approach—and we know that we must go forward.

The President must be given less discretion to ignore our trade laws.

We must invest in economic growth. Senator HART, myself, and several other Senators will offer a growth and investment initiative as an amendment to the budget resolution.

We will not shirk our responsibility to invest in future economic growth. Unless we invest in basic science, technological development, education, training, and trade promotion—our prosperity will not endure.

With or without the President's leadership, it is time to act.

So I look forward to joining with my colleagues today. I feel this is an important first initiative and we will need to continue to work with that as we go forward.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, Senators ROCKEFELLER and BINGAMAN have spoken about the resolution that they are introducing calling for the President to respond to the Young Commission recommendations. I support their efforts. I join in their efforts because I think that the administration's failure to respond to the Young Commission's recommendations is a gross disservice to this country.

The resolution which I am cosponsoring along with Senators ROCKEFELLER and BINGAMAN serves two important purposes: First, it underscores that we need to focus increased attention on the problem underlying our declining international competitiveness.

For too long we have relied on quick fixes to shore up our industrial and technological strength, and quite frankly we are not succeeding.

Second, the resolution points to the bald fact that the administration's "good intentions" have been just that and no more.

The Young Commission—unquestionably a blue-ribbon panel—was assembled almost 3 years ago. In January 1985, the group submitted over 400 pages of recommendations and findings to the President.

And those 400 pages have been ignored by this administration.

OVERVIEW OF THE PROBLEMS

This resolution is valuable because it makes us focus on competitiveness. Because the first step in becoming more competitive is to change our attitude.

We still do not think internationally.

We will not forgo current consumption for long-term savings and investment.

We are not trying to learn from the Japanese.

We are not promoting our children's education, particularly in science and technology.

And our business leaders will not sacrifice short-term balance sheet profits for long-term productivity.

The results of this problem are showing.

Take trade, for example. Last year, our trade deficit with Japan alone was 50 percent higher than our 1980 deficit with the entire world.

We as a nation do not put a high priority on exports.

In 1985, U.S. exports accounted for a mere 5.3 percent of GNP. By contrast, Japanese exports accounted for over 10 percent of GNP and West Germany's exports for almost 30 percent of GNP.

Our productivity is slipping.

U.S. productivity grew by only 1.2 percent annually between 1960 and 1983, compared with the substantially better performances of Great Britain, 2.3 percent; Germany, 3.4 percent; and Japan, 5.9 percent.

Our savings rate is much lower than that of any other industrialized country, and this deprives our companies of a pool of cheap capital for investment.

We are not doing enough on education. The average American child watches over 1,000 hours of television a year. It is no wonder that the average 17-year-old American knows half as much math as the average 17-year-old Japanese student.

OUTLINE OF THE BILL

To address these problems, I will be introducing a bill that is designed to complement the Rockefeller-Bingaman resolution and take it one step further.

On trade, the bill instructs the Secretary of Commerce to develop a proposal to establish a semiprivate, nonprofit U.S. export promotion organization similar to those used successfully by Japan, Korea, and others.

It will also instruct our Ambassadors worldwide to prepare annual reports cataloging the measures they have taken to promote exports of U.S. goods and services and to eliminate trade barriers. We simply have to place a much higher priority on exporting.

On R&D the key to our ability to compete over the long run will be the development of a highly skilled, highly trained core of engineers and scientists. The first step will be to improve the quality of scientific and technological education offered by our colleges and universities.

My bill would provide corporations with a 20-percent nonincremental tax credit for the wage costs of loaning their scientists and engineers to colleges and universities, to teach or perform basic research in the sciences.

My bill also incorporates a proposal which passed this body last year which would make available to our companies and research institutions more translations of Japanese technical literature.

Finally, the bill would amend the FOIA to make it more difficult for competitors to secure proprietary information.

I do not pretend that these modest measures will restore us to our position as an unchallenged economic giant. But as Samuel Johnson said, "The future is purchased by the present." Quite simply, we have to act now.

RESTORING AMERICA'S COMPETITIVENESS

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, almost 3 years ago President Reagan and his advisers realized that the United States and his administration had a major problem. The American economy was in trouble. Our trade deficit was beginning to grow. We were only slowly climbing out of the worst recession in decades. Our most basic industries were closing factories as foreign producers captured growing shares of our markets with high quality, attractively priced goods. Our traditional edge in high technology was slipping away to countries on the rim of the Pacific Basin. The American standard of living was growing more slowly than all the Western industrialized states except Great Britain. All of these problems and trends were combining to present the administration with a political problem as well. Democrats in Congress and on the Presidential campaign trail were beginning to talk about the need for a new industrial strategy to restore lost vigor to the American economy. Something had to be done.

So what did the President do? He appointed a commission to study the problem. Now, Mr. President, there is nothing necessarily wrong with appointing a commission. It is a traditional Government response when national problems are so complicated or the suggested remedies so diverse that there is a need for creative research and coalition building. What is wrong with appointing a commission, if the problem they are directed to study is a serious one, is a failure to act in some way on the recommendations the commission develops.

That, unfortunately, is what has occurred in this case. The 30 members of the President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness, chartered by President Reagan on June 28, 1983, spent 18 months documenting the problems confronting American industry in the face of new global pressures and released the traditional well-documented two volume report in January 1985. The Commission concluded the problem of declining American competitiveness was real and serious, and challenged the American Government to—

Recognize the challenge and its significance. We must equip ourselves with the skills required in the workplace of the future, adopt a flexible attitude toward changing markets and technology, and work together to strengthen the competitive performance of American industry.

The President's Commission crafted a series of recommended Government actions that formed a program which the Commission proudly pointed out—

Does not require any major increases in Federal spending * * * (with) minimal outlays that represent a prudent investment in the future.

The final report said the challenge of competitiveness must be the economic agenda for the next decade.

But that report and that agenda are gathering dust. In contrast to Presidential Commissions that call for new spending on weapons programs the Competitiveness Commission prompted no response from the Reagan administration. There is no sense of urgency, no repeated Presidential press conference endorsements, no high-level interagency implementation procedure, no legislative strategy to address the critical problems the Commission identified.

That is why our colleague, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ROCKEFELLER], has introduced a resolution calling on the President to report to the Congress on what, if any, plans he has to implement the Commission's recommendations. I commend my colleague for this initiative, and I hope it helps to prod this administration into action.

THE PRESIDENT'S COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL COMPETITIVENESS

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor this joint resolution seeking implementation of the recommendations of the President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness. Our ability to compete internationally faces, unprecedented challenge from abroad. To investigate this new reality of global competition, the President convened this blue ribbon Commission of 30 leaders from business, labor and academia. This resolution would urge the President to analyze these fine recommendations and to inform the Congress of the administration's plans for their implementation.

For the past two decades the United States has exhibited a declining ability to compete. Our productivity growth has been dismal—outstripped by almost all our trading partners. We are still the world's strongest economy. Yet, the question we must answer is where we will be tomorrow.

We cannot blame all our competitiveness problems on foreign trade and the dollar. The deterioration of our trade balance began more than a decade ago, when the dollar was widely thought to be weak. Some suggest that the best way to preserve American jobs is for Government to erect protectionist fences to limit foreign competition in the United States. I strongly disagree. A far better alternative to protectionism is a policy that encourages American workers and industries to rise up and meet the competitive challenge.

Our primary problem is not the surge of imports, which always rise with strong U.S. economic growth. It's a lack of growth in American exports. We must examine the ways in which the Government hampers competitiveness through unilateral impediments to growth—tax laws, securities laws, and other policies laws which inhibit research and development into new technologies and innovative areas. This is what we want to receive from the administration—it's overall strategy for reinstating the competitiveness of American industry, in order to increase jobs and exports.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator ROCKEFELLER and others in supporting this resolution requiring the President to report on the status and implementation of the recommendations of the President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness. But I must emphasize that while I strongly support this resolution, I am extremely sorry that it is necessary—but unquestionably, it is.

Responding to the growing concern among economists in academia, industry, and in government that the United States was facing a growing competitiveness problem, almost 3 years ago, in June 1983, President Reagan appointed a distinguished panel of experts to study the problem and make recommendations. Headed by John Young, the distinguished leader of the Hewlett-Packard Co., and staffed with some of the very best talent available, the Commission worked for more than 1 year to study the problems of American business.

The panel considered the full range of factors affecting the American manufacturing economy: productivity; capital formation, management-labor relations, human resource development; international trade; and the industrial policies of other nations. The commissioners' work was bipartisan and nonpolitical. Its goal was simple—to give the President of the United States the very best advice available on the state of the American economy, and to determine whether problems existed which could be corrected with national policy measures.

The Commission issued a report in March 1985 which found that indeed, the American economy faced serious competitive problems; low productivity, high cost of capital, and the growing threat of international competition. The report received a quiet reception in the media and from business, Government, and academic economists not because it was not respected or well executed, but rather because it simply confirmed a basic consensus which had been palpable since the late 1970's.

To most analysts, the major significance of the report was simply that it had, in fact, taken so long for such a consensus to develop at the highest level of government in our country, and the fact that such a respected group of business leaders chosen by the President had acknowledged that our economic future was not unclouded.

Unfortunately, President Reagan has chosen to ignore the Young Commission report, and to ignore the fundamental and growing threat to America's economic future. Our trade deficit continues to grow month by month to a level unimaginable at the time the Young Commission began its work. Our technological lead is increasingly in danger, our labor market continues to be undertrained and underprepared for the demands of the modern workplace, and our corporations are responding to the new realities of the global marketplace not beyinvesting in new American facilities and production, but by becoming in Businessweek's words, "hollow corporations" which rearrange financial assets, market foreign goods, and ignore the fundamentals of production that is essential for continued increases in the American standard of living.

Mr. President, this problem is too big for any individual business, or any one trade organization, or any single congressional committee or executive agency to attack. No matter how patriotic, concerned, or aware of the problem any of us are, it is not enough. Without a national commitment to the problem, it cannot be solved. This is what the Young Commission recommended.

Unfortunately, the President has chosen not only to ignore the plea for a national commitment to the problem, he has chosen to ignore the advice of his own panel, and deny that a problem exists at all. By this resolution, we in Congress can make known our commitment to acknowledge the problem, and to get on with the difficult process of addressing it through national policy before it is too late.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, my colleague from West Virginia, Senator ROCKEFELLER, has proposed an excellent—and timely—resolution. The resolution simply calls on the President to provide Congress with a progress report on implementation of the recommendations of the President's own Commission on Industrial Competitiveness, the so-called Young Commission.

No one disputes the fact that this Nation must improve the competitiveness of its industries if it is going to prosper and raise its standard of living in the years ahead. In response to growing concerns about our competitiveness, President Reagan appointed this Commission in late 1983. The President handpicked each Commission member, primarily from the ranks of business.

The Commission labored for over 1 year and submitted its report in January 1985. While not perfect, the recommendations of this Commission provide a constructive starting point for changing U.S. policies to enhance the competitiveness of industry.

Soon after the Commission completed its report last year, I invited its Chairman, John Young, the chief executive of Hewlett-Packard, to attend a retreat of Democratic Senators in Shepherdstown, WV. There was a discussion of many of the proposals made by the Commission and many Senators expressed the hope that the President would act expeditiously upon them.

Unfortunately, more than 1 year has passed and there is precious little evidence that this administration has taken the recommendations of its own Commission to heart. The work of this Commission is too important to the Nation's future to allow its recommendations to go the way of those from many other commissions. The future of our Nation's competitiveness deserves better than that. For that reason, I urge that my colleagues join in supporting this resolution.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR WILSON

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you, Mr. President.

SENATOR PAULA HAWKINS' SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise today on behalf of our distinguished colleague from the State of Florida, Senator PAULA HAWKINS, to insert into the RECORD a floor statement that Senator HAWKINS would make were she able to be present. She is, of course, convalescing from back surgery. We wish her well and a speedy recovery. In order to assist in the flow of business from her office during her involuntary absence. I am making the following statement for her. It is a statement which she has entitled "America's Drugs Problem: Fighting the Demand Side."

And I quote:

AMERICA'S DRUGS PROBLEM: FIGHTING THE DEMAND SIDE

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, it is now 374 days since one of the suspected murderers of DEA agent Enrique Camarena was indicted in a Mexican court. Another day has passed and still no word of action by the Mexican authorities. Mr. President, this lack of action is disturbing enough in-and-of itself. But it becomes even more glaring as part of a larger picture—a picture of corruption which allows drugs to flow across our borders and threaten our way of life.

The economic, social, and human costs of substance abuse are devastating to our society. We have all seen estimates of the dollar cost to our society, especially the cost of illegal drug abuse. Each year we lose millions of dollars in reduced productivity, health care, crime, and motor vehicle crashes.

But concerns over substance abuse cannot be easily reduced to dollars and cents. Think in human terms and the staggering effect of drug and alcohol abuse upon the emotional and physical health of our society as a whole becomes clear and frightening.

The illegal drug corporations fight for the control of our society through the most basic principle of economics—supply and demand. To be truly effective, the war on drugs must take the same approach. I have long fought for stiff penalties for drug pushers who would profit from destroying young minds. I have pushed for reduced aid for countries that permit the influx of drugs into America. That is the supply side.

But Mr. President, we must concentrate just as hard on the demand side. Fighting drug abuse here at home.

The Senate Subcommittee on Children, Family, Drugs and Alcoholism, which I chair, is responsible for authorizing the National Institute of Drug Abuse (NIDA). NIDA is the Federal government's strong right-arm in our demand side battle. Earlier this year, at the NIDA reauthorization hearing, I learned about one important piece of NIDA research on cocaine that is going on in Florida.

Dr. Jose Szapocznik (pronounced "Suppose-nick") testified at the hearing. He works out of the University of Miami with Hispanic adolescent drug abusers and their families.

Dr. Szapocznik testified that at his center, the family has always been the cornerstone of research.

While there are important moral reasons for maintaining the family as the essential building block of our social fabric, the doctor has also learned of compelling theoretical and scientific reasons for using the family strength in treatment and prevention of cocaine addiction.

Dr. Szapocznik uses the family to stop drug abuse. And it's working. His approach has been shown to eliminate drug abuse with incredible efficiency and in a remarkable short time. In Dr. Szapocznik's latest research group, of the teenagers who came to him for help, every-single-teenager . . . one hundred percent had given up all cocaine use at the time that they finished treatment. In an average of 12 outpatient sessions. These are mind-boggling statistics. Some of the first good news we have had in the drug war in years. And this is not just pie-in-the-sky. This remarkable success rate has been documented extensively.

And the price tag for this remarkable success? Dr. Szapocznik's receives a little over 200-thousand dollars in NIDA research money for this work. Clearly, this is tax money well spent.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Chair, and I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRESSLER). Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

DON'T TAKE AWAY THE RIGHT OF SENATORS TO SPEAK FREELY ON THE SENATE FLOOR

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, as a Senator who has taken aggressive advantage of the opportunity to speak on the floor of this body every day the Senate has been in session for many years, I was concerned by the statement by the majority leader today that rank and file Members of the Senate are taking too much time in speaking daily in special orders during morning business. The leader indicated that the time for those of us who wish to speak on the floor may have to be aborted, denied, postponed until later in the day, or pushed aside in some other manner.

Now, keep in mind that only a few weeks ago the leadership slashed the time a Senator may speak during morning business from 15 to 5 minutes.

Mr. President, one of the most important distinctions of this body—the Senate of the United States—is that Senators will have a chance to speak their minds freely and fully. More than any parliamentary body in the world, that has been true for nearly 200 years of the U.S. Senate. In the past 60 years that distinction has gradually left this body.

After World War I, the Senate adopted a cloture rule that permitted, at that time, two-thirds of the Senate to cut off debate. Then, 20 years or so ago, Senator John Pastore, of Rhode Island, succeeded in winning adoption of the so-called Pastore rule that limited any one Senator to speak only on the subject before the Senate on any matter that had been pending before the Senate for less than 3 hours. Since most legislation before the Senate takes far less than 3 hours to debate and discuss, the Pastore rule effectively limited Senators who wished to speak on subjects that might have significant national or international import to periods when the Senate was not discussing legislation, and that generally meant during the so-called morning business.

Senators were, up until a few weeks ago, permitted to speak any morning on the floor of this body for 15 minutes. Then came the advent of radio broadcasts—gavel-to-gavel—of Senate proceedings. The leadership, as I have said, decided to slash the time of any Senator who wanted to speak during morning business to 5 minutes. Now we are being warned that 5 minutes may be too much. Senators may be permitted to speak some other time during the day, provided such time became available. Perhaps a time would be reserved at the end of the day if the Senator could not come to the floor at a scheduled and prearranged time. With this unscheduled and unpredictable time, too bad and tough luck—no freedom to speak on that day.

Possibly Senators would be allowed to speak at a scheduled and prearranged time only twice a week or perhaps once a week or maybe once a month for 5 minutes.

Mr. President, this Senator is not being facetious. Television has not hit this body yet. It will in a relatively few days. In view of the rush to the floor by Members to take advantage of the radio exposure, we can expect an even greater surge when Senate proceedings go to a potential audience of millions on television.

Mr. President, this is one of the many reasons this Senator has consistently and strongly opposed putting this body's regular daily proceedings on television. It will sharply curtail the opportunity of Senators who wish to speak out on significant matters of national importance, to do so, unless that particular subject happened to be before the Senate in legislative form on that particular day.

So what should we do? How do we accommodate television and the desires of a very large proportion of the Members of this body to reach a television audience within the limited time available, without further restrictions on the freedom of Senators to speak their minds freely and fully on the floor of this body?

Mr. President, this Senator's suggestion is that all Senators be allowed to speak during morning business every day by coming in however early is necessary to accommodate this objective. That might be 9 o'clock or 8 o'clock or 7 o'clock or even earlier. This Senator will gladly come in at 5 o'clock in the morning if necessary. Obviously, those of us who are anxious to take advantage of the great tradition of this body to be allowed to speak fully and freely should be ready to make sacrifices, if it is necessary. We will get up early; we will come to work early. But do not take our right to speak our mind every day at a reasonably predictable time away from us.

Mr. President, I realize the convening of the Senate regularly at 8 o'clock or earlier would, under present practices, cruelly penalize the leadership. This is because the Senate leadership under present practice starts the Senate proceedings every day. But why is this necessary? Why could not the Senate convene at whatever time is necessary to accommodate Senators who wanted to speak? The leadership could come to the floor regularly at a later time—say 10 or 11 o'clock, or noon—to transact leadership business.

Mr. President, as I look at the distinguished and able people who do such a fine job of policing the Senate in so many ways, the Parliamentarian and his colleagues, I recognize that this would impose a sacrifice on them, too. I regret that. That is the price I guess we have to pay under the circumstances.

ADD QUALITY OF MILITARY PERSONNEL TO U.S. MILITARY EDGE OVER SOVIETS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in considering the U.S. military status versus the Soviets, what should we look for as the single most significant indicator of success or failure of either military capability? Is it military technology? Is it the economic strength that can produce the necessary military weapons? Is it the strength of the alliances the Nation may enjoy? All of these elements certainly contribute to military power and success. But, Mr. President, there is another frequently neglected element that is most important of all. It is the skill, the training, the morale, the discipline of the personnel that makes up the military forces. We learned that lesson in Vietnam. The Soviets are learing it in Afghanistan.

So how does the United States compare with our great superpower adversary in the quality of our personnel? First, there is no question the Soviets enjoy some advantages. Their population is larger. Their standing military forces are about twice as numerous. Their reserve military forces include every male citizen between the ages of 20 and 55 who is not on active duty. And virtually all the able-bodied Soviet population between 20 and 55 have served in the armed forces, a large proportion of them within the last 10 years. Soviet military personnel also showed impressive effectiveness in fighting Hitler's forces in World War II. The Soviets not only displayed great courage and endurance; they also demonstrated impressive military skill.

These are critical Soviet advantages, but today's Soviet military man also suffers some very serious weaknesses. In fact, the weaknesses are so severe compared to the military strength of American personnel that they constitute a serious Soviet disadvantage. A few weeks ago, the Secretaries of this Nation's Army, Navy, and Air Force testified over several days before the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee of the Senate. They were accompanied by the Chiefs of Staff of the three services and the Marine Corps.

As so often happens to good news in this country, the story did not get on the front page of the newspapers or in the big television network prime time evening news. But the news was not just good, it was terrific. Take the indicators of discipline in the U.S. Army. Violent crime by army personnel has been cut in half in the past 10 years. Since 1974, crimes against property have dropped to one-fifth of their rate 10 years ago. One-fifth, Mr. President. Desertion is down to a bare 25 percent of its level in 1974. How about absence without leave? That has dropped by a remarkable 80 percent.

Now, Mr. President, these are objective criteria. This is not hype. It is not self-praise. It is not rhetoric. These are cold, hard facts. This is the record. In every case, the objective measures of morale and discipline are by far the best of any time they have been in 10 years or more. The records of the Navy, the Air Force, and the Marine Corps show a similar astonishing improvement. Alcohol and drug abuse have both dropped spectacularly; and in all services. So our military personnel meets the first requirement of military behavior; that is, discipline far better than before and very possibly better than ever.

How about the capability of our military personnel as measured by their educational level? Mr. President, the educational level of U.S. soldiers, sailors, marines, and airmen has never been as high as it is today. Consider this: The total has risen from 61 percent with high school diplomas in 1980 to 93 percent today!

Compare this with the Soviet military personnel. Secretary Gorbachev, like his predecessors, has been trying to reduce the alcoholism problem in the Soviet society and, of course, in the Soviet military forces. He has a very formidable challenge. In a recent article in "Military Review," Prof. Richard Gabriel, who has been on duty with the Foreign Intelligence Directorate, has written that "Russian soldiers have at least the same high rates of alcoholism and alcohol-associated pathologies as the society at large and probably considerably higher." He quotes Victor Belenko, a recent Soviet Air Force defector, that his brother officers and his ground crew were drunk virtually all the time. Gabriel reports "a staggering number of assaults on officers by enlisted men who were drunk—a phenomenon virtually unknown in the American Army."

How about the training of Soviet military personnel? Joshua Epstein is a defense analyst at the Brookings Institution. He recently compared U.S. maintenance crews with their Soviet counterparts. He found that U.S. maintenance crews are 40 percent larger than similar Russian crews and receive twice the training time as their Soviet counterparts. A study of the Soviet Air Force prepared for the CIA in 1981 concluded training was "surprisingly 'pro forma' with little continuing effort to enhance skills under realistic conditions. Many of their sorties appear to be rather canned 'once around the flagpole and back' "

According to intelligence analysis, Soviet fighter pilots receive less than half the flying time that U.S. pilots do—7 hours per month compared with 19. Sally Stoeker, a Soviet specialist for the Rand Corp., reports that "many Soviet sailors are not trained to handle weapons or fight at night."

How about the awesome advantage for the Soviets in the size of the reserves compared to American reserves? Here is what Andrew Cockburn writes in his book, "The Threat Inside the Soviet Military Machine": "Soviet reservists, unlike those in Western armies, receive no training or weekend duty calls after they leave the active force. Furthermore, only about 1 percent of the U.S.S.R's active soldiers reenlist once their conscription ends." The actual de facto manning table for Soviet forces is even worse, according to the U.S. Defense Department. Fifty-five percent of the Soviet Army's estimated 190 divisions have less than half of their required personnel and equipment on hand: 20 percent have between half and three quarters. Rated by U.S. standards, this would mean that these Soviet divisions would be classified as not ready.

How do we explain this dramatic improvement in the morale and discipline of American military personnel? Two factors stand out. First, over the last 10 years, the pay of military personnel has consistently and sharply improved. As anyone who has ever hired employees to do a job in this American society can tell you, you get what you pay for. Higher pay has brought in personnel with better educational backgrounds. Recruiters can be choosers instead of beggars. They can take the pick of the litter, not the runt. In view of the supreme importance of personnel in military achievement, we should keep this firmly in mind while we determine our military priorities under the intense pressure of Gramm-Rudman.

Second, this remarkable 10-year improvement in morale and discipline of the American military dates roughly from the end of the draft and the beginning of the All-Volunteer Armed Forces. This Senator served in the peacetime draft Army for 9 months before Pearl Harbor in World War II. From that experience, I am positive that soldiers who are in the Army against their will may have talent but they do not have the motivation. They do not have the morale. They do not have the espirit de corps. They do not have the pride and enthusiasm in their unit. Volunteers are far more likely to have all of that. The Soviets have a drafted armed force. Ours is all volunteer. That is why AWOL, desertion, "gold-bricking" and low level of performance permeates the Soviet Armed Forces. It is why the U.S. Armed Forces have on the record improved so dramatically during the past 10 years.

Unquestionably the Soviets have an advantage over the American military force in sheer size. Just as the Chinese have a size advantage over the Soviet forces. But in the crucial military ingredients of morale, discipline, training, readiness, and the skills that come from actual flying time, sailing time, and maneuver time, the United States has a personnel advantage that ranks with U.S. superiority with respect to technology, economic strength, weapons superiority, the military strength of allies, and geographic position. The Russians certainly are not 10 feet tall. They are not 3 feet tall, either. But if ever it could be said that a great nation enjoyed the military power that permitted it to negotiate arms control from strength, it is the United States versus the Soviet Union in 1986.

Mr. President, some of the material in this speech came from an excellent article written by Fred Kaplan in the Boston Globe.

I yield the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, first of all, I congratulate and commend the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin for another one of his very thoughtful and very incisive statements on military power.

I think he contributes a great deal to the quality of the Senate's debate as well as the knowledge of the Senate and the country on matters involving the Armed Forces, our relative military posture as well as arms control.

I, for one, am very grateful to him for the thoughtful and in-depth research that he has provided for us in this and other speeches.

MYTH OF THE DAY: HIGHER SPENDING EQUALS HIGHER QUALITY SERVICES

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the myth of the day is that higher spending equals higher quality services.

You would think that we had learned our lesson that throwing money at problems does not solve them. But this myth blooms like a hardy perennial every spring in Washington and State capitals across the country. Curiously, it blooms at budget season, fertilized by a host of lobbyists, special interest groups, and corporations who stand to benefit at the taxpayers' expense.

But we often find evidence that money, by itself, does not solve our social problems, nor our national security problems.

A case in point is a recent report by the Health Research Group here in Washington, a project affiliated with Ralph Nader's Public Citizen organization.

In a report entitled "Care of the Seriously Mentally Ill," Drs. Fuller Torrey and Sidney Wolfe, came to a heretical conclusion in their review of State programs dealing with the very serious and tragic problems of the seriously mentally ill.

What did they find? Drs. Torrey and Wolfe found no correlation between a State's wealth, its per capita mental health expenditures, or its Federal allocation of supplemental security income [SSI] funds or Social Security disability income [SSDI] funds and the quality of services provided to these deserving Americans.

That is right, Mr. President. No correlation between dollars and quality.

In fact, overall State expenditures averaged $30.27 per capita while Wisconsin, the State with the highest ranking for its quality programs, spent one-third less per capita—$20.32.

And what is more, the next highest four States similarly spent an average or less than average amount of funds per capita.

Mr. President, my point is simple. Money is vital to these programs. Many of these individuals are unintended victims of well-intentioned efforts to deinstitutionalize the mentally ill over the last two decades and they desperately deserve our full support. In fact, we may well not be doing enough.

But as Wisconsin, Rhode Island, Colorado, and other States have proven, money is not the sole answer. It is leadership. Creativity. An awareness of how to integrate incentives for efficient management into programs. And most of all, it is heart.

The badger State has proven that conclusively in this area. And we need to spend a little more time helping States to learn from successful examples and, thereby, increasing the efficiency of our programs. And we need to spend a little less time debating percentage increases in programs. It is clear that the answer does not lie with budgets alone.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from the American Psychiatric News summarizing this study be reprinted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STUDY RATES MH CARE QUALITY BY STATE

The quality of state mental health services for the severely mentally ill is not determined by the amount of money poured into such services, according to a study released at a March press conference at the Health Research Group (HRG) in Washington, D.C. Internist Sidney M. Wolfe serves as director, and psychiatrist E. Fuller Torrey led the study. HRG is a component of the Public Citizen, a nonprofit organization founded by Ralph Nader.

Torrey and Wolfe described the study as the first state-by-state comparison of inpatient and outpatient programs for the approximately 2 million seriously mentally ill persons in the United States. Torrey told the press the study was designed to answer one major question—"If I had a mentally ill relative, in which states would he or she be better off?"

The states emerging with the highest combined rating for inpatient and outpatient services were Wisconsin, Rhode Island, Colorado, Maine, Oregon, Iowa, and New Hampshire. The states with the lowest ratings were West Virginia, South Carolina, Montana, Texas, Delaware, Mississippi, New Mexico, and Hawaii.

Torrey and Wolfe found no correlation between the quality of services and the state's wealth, its per capita mental health expenditure, or its Federal allocation of SSI/SSDI funds. For instance, the study observed, states spend an average of $30.27 per capita on mental health programs for the seriously mentally ill; however, Wisconsin, the highest ranked state, spends only $20.32 per capita. The next four highest ranked states also spend "an average or below average amount of money" on mental health programs, Torrey said.

In contrast, the District of Columbia spends more than any state on mental health programs—$176.17 per capita—yet the study ranked the city 43rd.

After Washington, D.C., New York comes in as the second biggest spender, allocating $74 per capita. Despite this large expenditure, the study slated New York 26th among the states.

Arizona spends less than any other state—$9.51 per capita—and was ranked 33rd by the study.

The study also considered the progress states are making toward improving their programs. "The states moving ahead most strongly are Colorado, Florida, Maine, Ohio, Oregon, and Rhode Island," the study maintained. States beset by "major problems" that impede reform are Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, Louisiana, Minnesota, South Dakota, and Wyoming.

Torrey and Wolfe conceded that their methodology was flawed by the subjective nature of some of their data and the varying amounts of information available for each state.

The ratings were based on surveys of state psychiatric hospitals conducted by HCFA, JCAH, and state departments of mental health, and on NIMH investigations of community mental health centers, states' handling of mental health block grants, and community support projects.

In addition, the authors interviewed about 20 mental health professionals who had extensive experience with several state delivery systems. They also asked each state affiliate of the National Alliance for the Mentally Ill (NAMI) and a network of expatient groups to assess state services.

Torrey and Wolfe concluded that "only a handful" of local and state programs are "providing high-quality services for the seriously mentally ill." Because mental health planners failed to assure that resources would follow patients into the community, deinstitutionalization was simply "put on automatic pilot," they wrote.

The authors further maintained there is no correlation between the quality of state programs and the per capita number of psychiatrists and psychologists practicing in the state. According to their study, programs in states with the highest number of psychiatrists and psychologists per capita (D.C., New York, Massachusetts, Maryland, and Connecticut) "are only slightly, but not significantly, better" than those states with the fewest psychiatrists and psychologists (Mississippi, Idaho, Arkansas, Alabama, and Louisiana).

Torrey and Wolfe criticized APA, the American Psychological Association, and the National Association of Social Workers, charging that the groups are not truly concerned with the needs of the seriously mentally ill. Torrey acknowledged John Talbott, M.D., immediate past president of APA, as "a rare exception" among mental health professionals because of his unflagging support for patients in the public sector.

CONSUMER GROUPS LAUDED

In contrast, the study saluted the work of religious groups, consumer groups such as NAIM, and expatient groups such as Maryland's On Our Own. Strong leadership and active consumer groups "are the two most important factors in improving services," the study said.

NAIM President Jim Howe told Psychiatric News that he would like to see state-by-state comparisons of mental health services become "an annual affair." When questioned about the study's assertion that consumer groups must bear the primary responsibility for public education and lobbying, Howe said he hoped the authors "don't mean to exclude providers, both profit and nonprofit, from acting as advocates for the mentally ill." He noted that many providers are already advocating "very successfully."

Among the study's specific recommendations were making block grants of SSI/SSDI funds to eliminate conflicts between Federal and state governments; decentralizing services to a regional or county level; and encouraging consumer groups to meet with HCFA and JCAH survey teams. (NAMI President Howe said NAMI has recently begun exploring this possibility with the JCAH Board in Chicago.)

"RIGHT DIRECTION"

"As painful as it might be for some states, I think it's a step in the right direction to force public mental health systems to consider how they provide services for the seriously mentally ill," said former APA president John Talbott, M.D., reacting to Torrey and Wolfe's analysis of mental health services by states.

Talbott added that he had some reservations about the study's methodology, which he believes may not have given enough weight to demographic and geographic differences between the states.

Talbott, who is professor and chair of the department of psychiatry at the University of Maryland School of Medicine in Baltimore, also discussed the problem of recruiting psychiatrists into the public sector. He pointed to the accomplishments of the Maryland Plan, which has recruited young pyschiatrists to the state's facilities and established strong links between state hospitals and the University of Maryland School of Medicine. "In 10 years, 155 university-trained psychiatrists have entered the public system," Talbott said. "It's terrific evidence that . . . you can attract top-flight professionals."

Torrey and Wolfe also praised the Maryland Plan in their report. They suggested that states with severe shortages of mental health professionals, such as Mississippi, Idaho, and Arkansas, might launch scholarship or loan programs requiring recipients to repay their debts by serving for a specified time in the state mental health system.

Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I would be delighted to yield 4 of my 5 minutes to the Senator from Wisconsin if he wishes to use it.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the gracious and generous offer of my friend from Tennessee. But I am sure that what he has to say is at least or more valuable than what I have to say. I have spoken so many times that I like to listen to him.

Mr. GORE. I appreciate my colleague's warm words.

Mr. President, I would like to defer my remarks until the Senator from Washington arrives on the floor. I will take my 5 minutes after he presents his remarks.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR GORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remarks I am about to make appear in the RECORD after the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. EVANS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 2328—A BILL TO PREVENT PRIVATIZATION OF POWER MARKETING ADMINISTRATIONS AND TVA

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill today to prevent the administration from carrying out a foolish and ill-conceived idea—the privatization of the power marketing administrations. In its fiscal year 1987 budget documents, the administration has proposed to initiate a process leading to the privatization of the five power marketing administrations by the end of 1991. The rationale and process for carrying out such a far-reaching proposal are not explained. It merely states that such a process will be guided by three very general principals, including "seeking a fair return to the Federal taxpayers" and "recognized the benefits currently enjoyed by existing customers." Nobody in the administration appears to know what these words actually mean and no administration official I have discussed this with so far has been able to explain and justify adequately this initiative. They show a remarkable lack of knowledge about electric power systems and the regions that these PMA's serve, including the economy of the Pacific Northwest that the Bonneville Power Administration serves.

The administration seems to be confused between two different and competing motivations for such an initiative: budgetary and ideological. Do they expect to extract a huge amount of money out of the PMA's to reduce the Federal budget deficit over the next 5 years? If so, how do they intend to account for the forgone revenues, both from principal and interest, that the Federal Government is receiving from these very same PMA's? For example, Bonneville paid more than $670 million in principal and interest to the Federal Government in fiscal year 1985. Or, as it appears more likely, is the administration proceeding from primarily ideological reasons to get the Federal Government out of the business of producing and transmitting electricity? The indications thus far are that the administration is proceeding from the latter motivation. It is only in that context that we might understand the double whammy that the PMA's are receiving from the administration's fiscal year 1987 budget: A proposal to accelerate repayments of the Federal investment and, at the same time, a proposal to privatize that investment. In any case, most of the analysis and study behind the privatization proposals seems to be coming from think tanks such as the Heritage Foundation, which demonstrate a fundamental lack of knowledge and misunderstanding about the role the PMA's play in the economies of different regions of the country.

The reason I am introducing this bill now is that I believe the privatization proposal is causing substantial uncertainty among businesses and individuals in the Pacific Northwest and other areas of the country. The proposal has caused especially adverse results in the Pacific Northwest because the Bonneville Power Administration plays such a major role in our region's economy. Businesses and industries were built on the basis of cheap, reliable hydropower distributed uniformly to all entities in our region. Thus the Pacific Northwest is much more dependent on electric energy than other areas of the country. There are already clear signs of uncertainty in our region. New companies which may decide to invest in the region are expressing uncertainty about the future of electric power supply at reasonable rates. Existing companies delaying back from additional investments due to this uncertainty. For example, Alcoa Aluminum has announced publicly that it plans to shut down permanently 25 percent of its smelting capacity by the end of 1986. It has two large smelters that are at risk in my State. With that type of uncertainty in the Pacific Northwest now, corporate planners could easily decide to make those cuts in our area. Additional production capacity, when and if it occurs, will probably go overseas. This would undermine the genuine efforts that Bonneville has made over the last year to keep aluminum production operating within the region through short-term incentives rates and other proposals.

In any privatization scenario, rates will go up. Various groups have done preliminary studies on the rate impact, with differing results. Such estimates, of course, depend greatly on the assumptions on the sales prices, interest rates, ability to use tax-exempt financing, and so forth. I believe that it is unrealistic to assume a sales price less than the $8.9 billion for Bonneville that the administration has published as its starting point for privatization discussions. Anything less is dreaming, in my view. The Northwest Power Planning Council, of which I was formerly chairman, recently carried out a study of the rate impact of such a sales price, assuming a sale to a private corporation using taxable bonds with an AA rating. I believe that auctioning off to the highest bidder, with no preference for tax-exempt financing, is the likely scenario. The council found that such a sale would result in a 71-percent rate impact.

The administration somehow believes that ratepayers in the Pacific Northwest pay too little for electricity. However, the aluminum companies are already seeking rate relief and account for 20 percent of the region's load. The California utilities are refusing to buy surplus Northwest nonfirm power at current rates since oil-fired generation is now cheaper. British Columbia Hydo seeks to market hydropower to Northwest utilities at rates below some current charges.

It is obvious, therefore, that the administration cannot succeed in raising rates necessary to justify the sales price they suggest. They have proposed a classic catch-22 proposition. Sell at a high price, which would raise rates, which would reduce electric sales drastically, which would make a high sales price impossible.

My bill is short and quite simple:

First, it prevents the administration from the "sale, lease, transfer, or other disposition" of any of the multipurpose dams or transmission facilities for a period of 10 years upon the date of enactment;

Second, the prohibition covers all the essential activities of the PMA's—the generation and transmission of electric power. It does, however, allow the sale of property and assets under various statutes that are necessary in carrying out the normal business of operating a utility of the size and complexity of the PMA's;

Third, the bill applies to the Bonneville Power Administration, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Western Power Administration, the Southeastern Power Administration, the Southwestern Power Administration. It, however, does not apply to the Alaska Power Administration since there are current discussions between the State of Alaska and the DOE over the transfer of these assets. It must be emphasized that the Alaska Power Administration's hydroelectric assets are very small and simple compared to the assets of the other PMA's.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD and that several articles and editorials attached be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2328

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for a period of ten years from the date of enactment of this Act, no federal official may solicit proposals or accept offers for the sale, lease, transfer, or other disposition, either in whole or in part, of any power production or transmission facilities located in the conterminous forty-eight states which are owned or operated by any federal agency and whose electric energy is transmitted for sale by a federal power marketing administration or by the Tennessee Valley Authority; Provided, That this provision shall not apply to: (1) the authority granted under Section 2(e) of the Bonneville Project Act of 1937; (ii) to the authority of the Tennessee Valley Authority pursuant to any law under which it may dispose of property in the normal course of business in carrying out the purposes of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended; (iii) to any business transactions involving the production and transmission of electric power among federal officials that may occur in the normal course of business; (iv) to the authority of the Administrator of the General Services Administration pursuant to the Federal Property and Administration Services Act of 1949, as amended, and the Surplus Property Act of 1944 to sell or otherwise dispose of surplus property.

STATEMENT OF RICHARD K. PELZ [1]

I have retired from government service at this time because I am opposed to the Administration proposal to sell the Bonneville Power Administration and the other power marketing administrations of the Department of Energy. I cannot in good conscience work to implement this proposal because I believe it is economically disruptive, fiscally irresponsible, administratively harmful, and intellectually dishonest.

The Bonneville Power Administration is the foundation of the bulk power supply arrangements in the Pacific Northwest. It supplies 65 percent of the power and has built and operates 80 percent of the high voltage transmission system. It has contracts for power or transmission services with all of the utilities and most of the heavy industry in the region, and with numerous utilities outside of the region. After raising rates more than 600 percent in six years, it has pledged a period of rate stability so the region can catch its economic breath. To help the aluminum industry through the serious economic difficulties it is facing and to keep it operating in the region, Bonneville has proposed a variable rate pegged to the world price of aluminum.

The Administration proposal fundamentally to alter the ownership and operations of Bonneville and to further raise its rates will seriously disrupt the business arrangements upon which the economic health of the region depends. Plans for power supply have to be made years in advance. The uncertainty created by the Administration proposal may well drive the aluminum industry to leave the region and certainly will cause other disorder in the industrial and commercial life systems of the Pacific Northwest.

The Administration proposal is fiscally irresponsible because fire sales of government assets do nothing to solve the underlying fiscal problems that are leading to steadily growing budget deficits. In fact, such sales will probably make the fiscal situation even worse in the years to come. Bonneville pays more money into the Treasury than it take out. Last year it made a payment of $600 million—$374 million for imputed interest on unamortized investment and $226 million to repay a portion of that investment. If Bonneville is sold, not only will this annual income stop, but there are at least four kinds of hidden costs that almost surely will not be fully passed on to the buyer. First, Bonneville performs a combination of proprietary functions—such as the sale and transmission of power—and governmental function—such as conservation, fisheries development, environmental protection, and negotiations with the Canadian and British Columbia governments. Today, revenues from the proprietary operations pay the cost of the governmental function. If the two are split, the taxpayers will have to start paying for the governmental operations. Second, the sale of Bonneville will engender litigation that will be costly to the United States. Third, the new buyer will insist on placing a limit on Bonneville's existing open-ended obligation to subsidize future irrigation development. Fourth, in order to obtain agreement from a reluctant Congress to pass legislation authorizing the sale, the Administration inevitably will be forced to make deals that will diminish the monetary returns to the Treasury initially and over time.

The Bonneville Power Administration is the finest federal agency that I have encountered in my 34 years in federal service. It is lean, productive, efficient; everybody works hard and morale is high. The Administration proposal will divert scarce resources of time and skill away from more constructive efforts to help the region and the Treasury. More importantly, it will seriously harm the organization. The committed people who work for Bonneville do so in significant part because of a conviction they are serving the public interest. To tell them their only motivation should be private gain will undermine morale, disillusion many of the best people and cause them to leave, and disrupt the smooth functioning of this outstanding agency.

It is intellectually dishonest for the Administration to submit a budget to Congress that shows any significant revenues from the sale of Bonneville and the other power marketing administrations (PMAs) in near future years. The legal, technical, financial, administrative, and political problems to be resolved before a transfer can be consummated are enormous. For example: What do you do with the federal dams, which are operated by the Army Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation for many purposes besides power, such as navigation, flood control, municipal and industrial water supply, irrigation, fish and wildlife and recreation? Do you transfer just the right to the power output, the powerhouse, or the complete dam and reservoir including the powerhouse? How is the buyer going to finance the transaction? If the buyer is a public agency, will it be permitted to issue tax-exempt bonds, which will reduce the returns to the Treasury? To what extent will the buyer assume responsibility for fish end wildlife programs, for conservation programs, for compliance with the Columbia River Treaty with Canada, for reimbursing the Treasury for the costs of past and future irrigation projects, etc? On what basis will price be determined? What happens to the Pacific Northwest Planning Council? Will the buyer be bound by the long-standing federal principles of preference in the sale of power to public bodies and cooperatives and of rates based on the recovery of costs without making a profit? What happens to the employees of the PMAs and the other affected federal agencies?

These problems and many more would take years to resolve even if there were a consensus in favor of the transfer, which there is not. The Administration's proposal to sell the PMAs popped up a month or so ago as somebody's bright idea about how to temporarily reduce the budget embarrassment and meet the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets. No serious staff work had been done in the Department of Energy to analyze or support it. The Administration proposed last year in the FY 1986 Budget to raise the rates of the PMAs through measures labeled repayment reform. This proposal was stopped dead in its tracks by Congress. Yet the proposed sale of the power administrations would lead to much higher rates. The Administration also proposed last year that the Alaska Power Administration be sold. This is a far simpler and far less controversial transfer to accomplish than transferring any of the other PMAs—it involves only two small single-purpose power projects, each with a radial line serving only one isolated market area; and the Alaska Power Authority, a state agency newly entering the power industry, is a logical customer. Yet the Administration a year later still has not submitted a bill to Congress to implement the proposed transfer because of a lack of interest and a lack of agreement on details. In view of this record, no assumption as to an early sale of any PMA other than Alaska can possibly be justified.

I have focused on Bonneville because it is the largest power marketing administration, but the same analysis applies to the other PMAs as well. They have raised their rates substantially in recent years. They pay back to the Treasury each year more than they spend. They have entered into power supply arrangements that are important to the regions they serve and would be seriously disrupted by the sale of the agency. They perform governmental functions as well as proprietary ones. They sell power from multiple-purpose dams operated by other federal agencies, the best known of which is Hoover Dam on the Colorado River. They are staffed by competent people committed to serving the public interest. There are hidden costs that would not be covered in the transfer. There is no political support for selling them, and there is a great deal of political opposition to a sale. Congress should reject the proposal to sell them—as well as the proposal to sell Bonneville—out of hand.

I'd Buy It Myself and Turn Out Lights

(By David S. Broder)

Washington.—The word is an atrocity, but the most appealing notion in President Reagan's 1986 program is "privatization." Selling off some of the government's facilities or functions to private enterprise or individuals is a jimdandy idea.

I am attracted to it in part because one of the things Reagan has in mind selling soon is the Bonneville Power Administration on the Columbia River, and I have been a Bonneville freak since I was 16.

That summer, two buddies and I celebrated the end of the war and our escape from home by bumming around the West. Bonneville Dam was the biggest thing I'd ever seen—a marvel to behold.

In the summer of 1969, when my own family was on the mandatory Western trip, I dragged my four sons off to see the dam for themselves. They complained bitterly on the drive over that they hadn't had time enough to gallivant around on Mount Hood. But when we descended into the great dam and felt the pounding of its power-plant turbines, they were as awed as I had been almost a quarter-century before.

The sale, to be honest, does not come up at a convenient time. I have some unexpected expenses around the house, and the car has not been running smoothly. But if there is a chance to buy Bonneville, I'm going to buy it.

In megalomaniacal moments, I think what fun it would be just to stand there with my hand on the switch and say, "Goodnight, now, Portland," and turn out the lights.

But what I really covet is the fish ladder. It would be great to go down to the dam at the end of a trying day and just watch the salmon go by. My salmon climbing my fish ladder. Feel like some salmon for dinner? Well, sure. How about that one? Help yourself.

Sen. Mark Hatfield, R-Ore., was quoted as saying that Bonneville would be sold "over my dead body." But you know that in politics, money talks, and I figure Hatfield just wants to be sure Reagan gets a good price.

It did bother me some that Fortune magazine, which might have been thought likely to understand the attractiveness of privatization, had an article by Lee Smith saying, "The administration's plan to sell off the government is a political, not an economic, measure."

But as I thought about it, Smith's proposition became less offensive and more accurate.

Indeed, nothing so clarifies the question as to whether something should be done by the government as to ask: Is it something you'd want if the government were offering it for sale?

There are many things beyond Bonneville I'd like to buy from the government, but "nonlethal aid" to the contras would not be among them. Far more appealing to me are a couple of lighthouses in northern Michigan or that underwater national park off St. John's in the Virgin Islands.

If the notion catches on, it could produce some healthy competition among Cabinet members. Suppose that Reagan establishes an incentive program in which the more a department sells, the more money it will have to buy some new things. Cap Weinberger would have funds for the Strategic Defense Initiative lasers only if he could peddle several hundred of his Bradley Fighting Vehicles as being for freeway and RV use in California.

Similarly, on the domestic side there is much to recommend the privatization strategy. If you were running the Department of Agriculture, would you give out food stamps to good customers? I suspect that in order to keep the farmers going in these tough times, I would, and not grudgingly, either.

I know it would be great to have clinics for expectant mothers and premature infants operting under my name, to say nothing of having an aircraft carrier or two at one's call. No mugger is going to give you any trouble when he understands you have your own aircraft carrier, just over the horizon.

If the Department of Transportation underwent privatization, there might still be subsidies for mass transit—but not for any city with so little pride that it tolerated graffiti on its subway cars or Mayor Koch at the controls.

The Treasury Department would give out toaster ovens to those patriotic enough to buy bonds, and if you made a really big purchase to help refinance the debt, you might get a compact-disc player.

The Department of Justice could sell its own brand of affirmative-action certificates, in gold or silver, reading: "I'm so sincere in my belief in equality, I don't have to prove it."

There really is no limit to the privatization strategy—except at the White House fence. I don't think we should sell the White House, no matter what complaints we may have about the way Donald Regan runs it. There has to be someone in America tough enough to fire Lee Iacocca, and Regan just proved he is the man.

Any week that liberates Ananoly Shcharansky from the Soviets' grip and the Statue of Liberty from Iacocca's embrace is a great week for privatization.

SALE OF BPA THREAT TO NW

The future of the federal Bonneville Power Administration is an issue of increasing concern in the Pacific Northwest as well as in Washington, D.C. It results from the Reagan administration's proposed sale of the agency within the next few years and, in the meantime, accelerated payments on the region's BPA debt to the U.S. Treasury.

Both of these proposals would be damaging, perhaps even devastating, to the Northwest economy which is so heavily dependent on relatively low electric-power rates.

One possible means of dealing with this threat, under discussion, is regional, four-state purchase of the BPA system and its hydro-electric power assets to enable the Northwest to gain control of its own economic destiny. That could be an ultimate answer, but it's far from a problem-free solution. The best outcome would be for the BPA's current status, including its regional debt repayment structure, to be maintained. It's to that end that the region's efforts in Congress must be addressed.

Sen. Dan Evans, R-Wash., former chairman of the Northwest Power Planning Council and member of the Senate Energy Committee, has become a leading spokesman on behalf of maintaining BPA's status quo.

In arguing against accelerated Northwest payments on the BPA debt, which would raise electric rates accordingly, Evans notes that higher rates would not necessarily produce more federal revenue because they would be accompanied by a decline in regional economic growth and stability.

As for sale to the highest bidder, the most likely prospect would be BPA's purchase by California utilities which drool at the thought of diverting Northwest power to the Southwest.

"This is clearly the option that we must fight most strongly," notes Evans.

As for a regional BPA buyout, problems would include the need to renegotiate some 10,000 existing BPA contracts, the fact that public utilities could lose their priority rights to regionally generated power, and the danger that a regional entity could have less authority to prevent a California power grab than the federal BPA.

A regional buyout remains a possible option worthy of further study, but maintenance of BPA's existing status clearly should be the Northwest's goal for now.

[From the Puget Sound Business Journal, Feb. 17, 1986]

SALE OF BPA SYSTEM WOULD CAUSE CHAOS

The only beneficiaries of the Reagan administration's proposal to sell the Bonneville Power Administration likely will be attorneys.

That's the only clear conclusion people can draw from the state of near chaos into which the Northwest's energy planning has been thrown by the administration's desire to "defederalize" the region's federally controlled power grid.

Before any sale takes place, a thicket of practical and legal questions needs to be addressed.

What, specifically, is for sale? The BPA owns the major electrical grids in Washington, Oregon, Idaho and western Montana and the huge intertie line connecting the region with California. But it doesn't own any of the 30 dams from which it obtains power—they're owned by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation.

What happens to preference? Under current law, Bonneville must give first priority to power customers in the Northwest, especially municipal utilities or public utility districts. In any sale, if preference is maintained, investor-owned utilities likely will object in court. But if preference is eliminated, public utilities are bound to moan before the bench.

What happens to BPA's antitrust immunity? As a federal agency, Bonneville is exempt from provisions of the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts. But that wouldn't be the case if a private entity took over the agency.

What happens to the separate contracts Bonneville has with some 10,000 parties? Those contracts can't be changed without the consent of both parties, so all likely would have to be renegotiated.

How will the sale affect Bonneville's WPPSS liabilities? Bonneville has acquired the power produced by WPPSS plants Nos. 1, 2 and 3. But if the federal agency is no longer a party to the power agreements, bondholders of those projects might fear that the security of their investment has been jeopardized. They could go to court arguing that the sale has brought their bonds into technical default and demand immediate payment of principal and accrued interest on their investment.

Only lawyers can get excited about these questions. But they should make the rest of us shudder.

During the 1980s, energy and securities attorneys have turned WPPSS litigation into a professional welfare trough. The Reagan administration's BPA proposal looks like it would perpetuate that welfare system well into the next decade.

[From the Idaho Statesman, Mar. 26, 1986]

SELLING BPA: IT AIN'T BROKE, SO WHY FIX IT?

For nearly 50 years, the Bonneville Power Administration has been as integral to the economy of the Pacific Northwest as the high-voltage power lines that crisscross the Cascades. Selling the BPA could unravel all that.

Born of the Reagan administration's philosophy that government shouldn't do what private industry can, the president has proposed selling the electrical giant. As a practical benefit, the $8.85 billion sale price would help reduce the federal deficit.

How deeply ingrained the BPA has become in the Northwest is measured by the nearly unanimous opposition of regional politicians to its sale. It's one issue on which Idaho's conservative Republican Sen. Steve Symms and moderate Democratic Gov. John Evans—who are running against each other for the Senate this year—agree.

First off, the $8.85 billion asking price is all wrong. The BPA values its worth at $22 billion. The Heritage Foundation think tank suggests $38.8 billion as a price tag. The president's figure would only dent the deficit.

Secondly, there's not evidence that the BPA could be better run by private enterprise. Its customers—about half the electricity users in the Northwest, including 200,000 Idahoans—seem happy with the service. A big reason is that its electric rates are the nation's lowest. Under Administrator Peter Johnson, a former Trust Joist Corp. president, the BPA's financial picture has stabilized and the utility is again paying back principal on its federal loans.

Most importantly, since its Depression-era creation in 1937, the BPA has become as essential to the Northwest economy as timber on the Cascade slopes. The BPA has 3.7 million customers, 14,000 miles of transmission lines and operating revenues of $2.6 billion; it is crucial to Northwest businesses employing 400,000 people.

Selling the BPA surely would mean higher power rates. One study predicted that rates would jump a third if the BPA were sold at the government's $8.85 billion price. If the BPA were sold for $22 billion, rates might skyrocket 218 percent. That could mean a loss of 100,000 Northwest jobs and cost the government more in lost taxes than it earned from the sale.

Even speculation about selling the BPA jeopardizes the economic health of a four-state region. It's unthinkable to place the Pacific Northwest's future in the hands of a few profit-minded out-of-staters.

The BPA has worked well these 49 years, ain't broke, and needs no fixing. In Mr. Johnson's words: "Whatever we do, don't destroy what we have in search of something that is just a vision."

AN INTERNAL MEMORANDUM OF SEATTLE CITY LIGHT

In recent months, a number of proposals have surfaced in the Northwest and in Washington, D.C. relating to the possible sale of the Bonneville Power Administration (BPA or Bonneville) by the federal government.

Threshold questions which arise in this connection are as follows:

A. What is to be sold?

BPA itself owns and operates only the regional electric transmission system. By law, it markets the power from generating facilities at dams owned and operated by the Bureau of Reclamation and from the Army Corps of Engineers. By separate Acts of Congress it has also acquired through exchange and net billing arrangements, the project output of the Hanford Generating Project owned by the Washington Public Power Supply System together with the output of Supply System Plants 1, 2, and 3. (WNP 1/2/3). As a result of the default by the Supply System on revenue bonds issued to finance the construction of Supply System's plant 4 and 5, Bonneville is also still involved, despite a recent district court ruling favorable to it, in securities litigation relating to those plants. Thus, any such proposal must address in detail all the various facets of Bonneville's activity and make clear what it is that is being sold.

As a practical matter, it would seem likely that the obligation of BPA with respect to all the WPPSS plants would have to be assigned along with the transmission facilities of Bonneville itself. It might be possible, however, to separately dispose of the actual generating plants owned by the Corps and by the Bureau.

B. Who will be the Buyer?

It has been suggested on one hand that the sale should be to the highest bidder. In such case California entities, private power companies and/or Canadian interests would certainly be potential purchasers. On the other hand it has been suggested that the sale should be made to a consortium of public agencies or an interstate compact in the Northwest. The outcome of this basic question promises to be a heated policy struggle that would dramatically affect the nature and type of sale arrangements.

C. What will be the price?

Suggested Sale prices have ranged from a debt-based $3-5 billion to a value-based $25 billion. The answer to these questions lie primarily not with economic analyses, but with policy determinations.

This memorandum of course does not answer these ultimate questions of sales price, subject matter, or possible purchasers. Its purpose is to identify certain general factors which must be taken into account in any proposed arrangement.

1. Existing BPA Contracts:

Virtually all BPA contracts—about 10,000 in all—preclude assignment or amendment of the rights and obligations of Bonneville except to another government agency without the consent of the other parties. These agreements, in turn, refer to and are predicated upon the statutory and administrative structure of federal regulatory processes by which BPA rates and policies are established. This being the case, any disposition of Bonneville assets would have to satisfy all existing parties to Bonneville contracts. A unilateral assignment of Bonneville contracts detrimental to any nonfederal party would surely be the subject of serious challenge.

One example of the degree to which Bonneville's actions are tied to the federal regulatory process serves to illustrate the difficulty of disentangling these ties. FERC has recently held that, while under the Northwest Power Planning and Conservation Act it lacks authority to review and determine the reasonableness of rate design, it nevertheless has a statutory and contractual obligation to review cost based rate levels, predicated upon federal treasury repayment levels. Thus, any purchaser of Bonneville's rights and obligations could be limited to those rates now charged by Bonneville, absent clear Congressional action to the contrary, which itself would be subject to court challenge. The outcome of a dispute over rate flexibility by a purchaser is unpredictable, and contributes to the continuing uncertainty regarding what really would happen if Bonneville were sold.

2. The Pacific Northwest Preference Act (PL 88-552):

The Pacific Northwest Preference Act mandates that Bonneville must give first priority in the sale of electricity to Northwest entities. Any sale arrangements would have to take into account existing contract elements which have implemented terms and provisions of this regional preference. However, what Congress can do in one session it can undo in another. Any sale to the highest bidder could eliminate any future regional sale restrictions, especially if bids from California entities are invited. Thus, Pacific Northwest preference would be placed at high risk during any sale process. Any change in regional preference would likely result in a substantial transfer of economic benefits presently enjoyed by the Northwest to California entities.

3. Antitrust Provisions:

At present Bonneville, as an agency of the United States Government, enjoys immunity from the provisions of the Sherman and Clayton Antitrust Acts. Any sale of Bonneville assets, either to private parties or a regional consortium, could hardly be expected to carry with it such general or even limited immunity. It is, therefore, to be expected that future operations of any purchaser would be considerably more constrained by antitrust considerations than is Bonneville.

4. Intertie Access Policy:

Bonneville's intertie access policy which regulates access to the intertie in a manner favorable to the Northwest (and which has been recently upheld by the Ninth Circuit against a California challenge) would certainly be jeopardized. The Ninth Circuit decision focused primarily on the board, regulatory powers of Bonneville as a federal agency. Removing Bonneville's status as a federal agency removes the underpinning for the preservation of the intertie access policy. There is little question that in any sale, questions relating to intertie access from the Canadian Border to California would be the subject of both scrutiny and substantial pressures for change. As in the case of regional preference, any change in the intertie access policy would probably produce a transfer of economic benefits from the Northwest to California.

5. Washington Power Supply System Contract:

All contracts to which Bonneville is a party can not be unilaterally abrogated. Thus, the provisions of all exchange and net billing arrangements would have to be taken into account, as well as continuing contingent liabilities resulting from Projects 4 and 5. If BPA's obligations under the WNP 1, 2, and 3 net billing agreements are transferred, the bondholders and bond trustee could regard this as an impairment of underlying security, giving rise to an asserted event of default, which in turn could trigger the entire principal and accrued interest on the WNP 1, 2, and 3 bonds to become due and payable immediately.

6. Bonneville's Supply System Liabilities:

Any sale of BPA would still mean that BPA would remain liable for contingent Supply System liabilities for actions which had taken place prior to the sale. To meet this problem, the government could either eliminate such liability by settling the litigation, or indemnify the buyer from and against any such liability. The absence of federal indemnification could seriously inhibit a sale, however, since the potential buyer would have no way of knowing the extent of its exposure.

7. Pacific Northwest Power Planning and Conservation Act:

An elaborate administrative process has now been set in place dealing with regional power planning, conservation, and fish and wildlife matters. In the event of sale of the federal power system, there is little reason to believe that these matters would not again be the subject of renewed public inquiry and probable change. Thus, all existing arrangements relating to power planning, conservation, and fish and wildlife protection which are only now achieving some stability would again be thrown into flux.

8. Pacific Northwest Coordination Agreement of 1964:

The Coordination Agreement provides basic ground rules under which the coordinated hydroelectric and steam generating plants of the Pacific Northwest are operated. Bonneville is a party to this contract. Without question any sale arrangement would have to take this "charter-type" contract into consideration. No amendment of the Coordination Agreement is possible without the consent of all parties and any unilateral violation of its terms by Bonneville, would amount to an impairment of a contractual obligation and possible lawsuits in the Courts of Claims and lawsuits under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. In addition, the United States Constitution specifically prohibits states from acting to impair the obligation of contracts. Consequently, any interstate compact arrangement or any other type of sale based an individual state legislation could be challenged under the U.S. Constitution.

9. Public Agency Preference-And Beyond:

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, a basic and fundamental provision of the existing Bonneville Project Act and the Northwest Power Planning and Conservation Act is and has been the preference in power sales accorded to public agencies. We have recently seen, in the development of sweeping amendments to federal hydroelectric relicensing legislation, that Congressional support for public preference has weakened substantially. It is therefore reasonable to project that any legislation relating to the sale of Bonneville could result in the elimination or reduction of preference, all to the disadvantage of Seattle and every other public power system in the Northwest. The results of such weakening of preference would become even more impalpable after expiration of the existing power sales contracts since contractual protection would then disappear.

TO PROHIBIT SALE OF PMA'S/ TVA/BPA

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, today I join my distinguished colleague from Washington, Senator EVANS, in introducing legislation to prohibit the selloff of the Federal power marketing administrations and the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The administration has been floating this idea for 5 years, so the current proposal to dump the power marketing agencies—part of the President's budget—is no surprise. But Mr. President, this is an idea whose time has still not yet come, and in my view, will never come. And I am confident that, for the foreseeable future, it is an idea that the Congress will forcefully reject. That is the intention of the bill we introduce today, and we urge our colleagues to join us in sending the administration that message loudly and clearly.

Let me take a moment to note some of the implications of such a fire sale of United States' assets.

Although the administration now says it does not intend to auction off the Tennessee Valley Authority, there is no secret that officials at OMB have been studying this idea. Without question, such a plan would devastate the entire Tennessee Valley region, wreak economic chaos, eliminate vital fertilizer research, demonstration, conservation, and environmental quality programs. A half century of success in one of this country's most important public programs would be tossed on the heap like surplus GSA office furniture.

Instead of producing an alleged windfall for the Treasury, the process of disposing of one of our most valuable public assets would carry enormous costs in itself, produce nominal Treasury revenues at best, yet drive up electricity rates for millions of Americans, all to satisfy the current obsession with the concept of "privatization."

If the news of the administration's early plan to sell off TVA was a trial balloon, then let us put the pin to it without delay. It deserves to burst before leaving the ground.

The proposal to sell off the power marketing administrations, on the other hand, is no trial balloon. The administration is deadly serious about this proposal and committed to what I believe is an equally flawed proposition.

The Department of Energy operates five PMA's which sell electric power produced from hydropower resources on public waterways. The five PMA's are Bonneville in the Northwest, and Western, Southeastern—which has corps dams on the Tennessee River—Southwestern, and Alaska. These facilities include dams built by the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation.

The PMA's wholesale this hydropower under contracts to utilities at cost of production and transmission. PMA's repay the Federal Treasury for the public investment in these facilities. It costs the taxpayers not one penny.

The President's fiscal year 1987 budget proposes to sell all PMA-operated transmission facilities. The selloff would occur by auction or direct negotiation with "regional and private interests." The administration claims a total deficit reduction of $12.7 billion over the next 5 years. Mr. President, I believe that savings is pure illusion. In fact, I believe it is not deficit reduction that the administration seeks in this fire sale but simple ideological purity in the pursuit of privatization for its own sake.

Let me take a moment to describe how the PMA fire sale would affect Tennessee.

TVA and other public and private utilities throughout the Southeast have long-term contracts to purchase hydropower from the Southeastern Power Administration [SEPA]. TVA then resells this hydropower to local distributors for their residential customers under provisions of the TVA Act restricting low-cost hydropower to residential users.

In 1984, TVA purchased from SEPA, and resold to valley distributors, approximately 3.2 billion kilowatt hours of electricity from SEPA dams, or 4.5 percent of all of TVA's sales. TVA paid SEPA approximately $14 million for that power.

If SEPA assets were sold to the highest bidder, its new charges for power would be, at minimum, the estimated market cost of replacement power. Even if the high bidder would agree to continue selling that power to TVA ratepayers, TVA would then be forced to pay approximately $125 million for power now costing $14 million.

A $110 million increase in TVA electricity costs would force an overnight rate increase for TVA ratepayers of about 7 percent. Those increases would be mirrored throughout the country as utilities face greatly increased costs for PMA-marketed hydropower. In addition to skyrocketing ratepayer increases, the administration's plan is flawed in other ways:

First, the purported Treasury windfall from a selloff of the PMA's is highly speculative. Not a single administration study has been presented to credibly support the revenue levels anticipated from such a sale. Whatever did come would be from the pockets of electricity ratepayers. There has never been a similar selloff from which to analyze transaction costs, market participation, and so forth. For example, the DOT's plan to sell Conrail, at $1.2 billion, is the largest such effort ever undertaken by the U.S. Government.

Second, even if these assets could be sold, the price would be so high as to force either a breakup of the systems involved, or such a degree of financial leverage as to endanger the very solvency of the power distribution systems.

For example, if unguaranteed bonds were issued to finance a purchase of Corps of Engineers or Bureau of Reclamation dams, billions of dollars of new capital would be needed, at interest rates sufficiently high to attract investors. Those costs would necessarily be passed on to utilities, who then might be forced to build new capacity from nuclear or coal-fired facilities. In any event, utility planning would be disrupted, directly affecting their customers.

Third, the administration has not taken into account the legal commitments that currently exist between the PMA's and the utilities. TVA's contract, for example, is in place through 1994.

Fourth, these corps and land reclamation dams were built to provide public benefits and produce economic growth for the regions they serve—not to create a corporate windfall opportunity for investors taking advantage of a Government fire sale.

Fifth, the public investment in PMA facilities is being paid back. Mr. President, it is being paid back with interest. There is no taxpayer subsidy involved. Yet, if private investors purchase these assets, it is certain that huge tax deductions or credits would subsidize the sale—in other words, the selloff itself would be subsidized by the taxpayer. That, in fact, has been one of the major criticisms of the Conrail sale, although there are many differences between the two cases.

Mr. President, the list of reasons to oppose the selloff of TVA and PMA goes on and on. In fact, there are simply no credible reasons to support the administration plan. The bill Senator EVANS and I and others will introduce today would foreclose the administration from advancing such a wrongheaded proposal disguised as a deficit reduction move. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation

PROHIBITING THE SALE OF POWER MARKETING ADMINISTRATIONS FOR A 10-YEAR PERIOD

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from Washington [Mr. EVANS] and others in sponsoring legislation to prohibit the transfer or sale of Federal Power Marketing Administrations [PMA's] or the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The Reagan administration has advocated the sale of a number of government assets including the five power marketing administrations. The administration has proposed the sale in order to get the Government out of activities that it believes the private sector could perform more efficiently. In addition, the administration argues that the sale of the PMA's will reduce the Federal budget deficit and contribute to fiscal restraint.

Selling the PMA's in the name of budget savings and deficit reduction is short-sighted at best. It is false and dishonest at worst.

Sale of the PMA's would be fiscally irresponsible, and would lead to a breakdown of the delicate but effective balance between public and private utilities.

A quick sale of the PMA's would do nothing to solve the underlying fiscal problems that have led to steadily growing budget deficits. Government asset sales generally result in only temporary reduction in the Federal budget deficit. In fact, such sales would probably make the situation worse in years to come.

Unfortunately, in its efforts to cut the deficit the Reagan administration has identified a target that pays more money into the Treasury than it takes out. For example, last year the Bonneville Power Administration made a payment of $600 million to the Treasury—$374 million for imputed interest on unamortized investment, and $226 million to repay a portion of that investment. This payment meets the repayment obligations to the Treasury under current law.

I question the validity of the Reagan administration's claim that privatizing government assets leads to an improvement in the quality of service at a lower cost in the case of PMA's.

If the Government sells an asset to the private sector, the sale should be arranged in a way that ensures the support of the employees, management, and customers alike. The goal should not be to squeeze every dime possible out of the sale. Unfortunately, the Reagan administration's proposal to privatize Federal Power Marketing Administrations is driven by ideology rather than by sound business judgment.

The effect of privatization would certainly be higher electric rates for millions of consumers. Refinancing costs would have to be passed on to consumers. This would be catastrophic for regions that receive a substantial portion of their electricity from a Federal power program.

In the Northwest, a significant increase in electric rates would send more of the struggling aluminum industry overseas, where foreign governments who believe in fostering industry would provide reasonably priced hydropower.

This would lead to an enormous power surplus. Homeowners and businesses would be forced to pick up the Bonneville Power Administration's operating costs abandoned by the aluminum industry.

In recent years, all five PMA's have raised their rates substantially. Each year they pay back to the Treasury more than they spend.

All five PMA's have entered into power supply agreements that are vitally important to the regions they serve. These agreements would be seriously disrupted by a sale.

The PMA's perform proprietary functions as well as government functions. A sale would force the transfer of governmental functions such as conservation, fisheries development, and environmental protection to another Federal agency. Today, revenues from the proprietary operations pay the costs of the governmental function. A sale would force taxpayers to pay for the governmental operations.

Privatizing the five Federal Power Marketing Administrations would penalize millions of consumers by unnecessarily driving up rates.

The American people should continue to benefit from the services provided by the five PMA's. Selling them would be a great disservice to all utility customers.

I urge my colleagues to support this crucial legislation.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will now be a period for morning business.

OPPOSITION TO CERTAIN IMPORT RESTRICTIONS IMPOSED BY EUROPEAN COMMUNITY ADVERSELY AFFECTING U.S. AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send a concurrent resolution to the desk on behalf of Senator HELMS, Senator ZORINSKY, and others, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 129) expressing the sense of Congress in opposition to certain import restrictions imposed by the European Community that adversely affect United States agricultural exports and urging the President to use to the fullest extent his authority to respond to these practices.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BYRD. No objection.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, today I am joined by the majority leader, the distinguished ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, Senator ZORINSKY, Senator WILSON, Senator BOREN, Senator BOSCHWITZ, and Senator DANFORTH, among others, in bringing to the Senate floor a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress in opposition to the European Community's latest round of restrictions on U.S. agricultural exports and urging the President to use to the fullest extent his authority to respond to these practices.

When the European Community was expanded to include Spain and Portugal in January of this year, additional restrictions were placed on American agricultural exports that could affect as much as $1 billion in U.S. farm exports annually.

As the language of the resolution points out, the oilseed, oilseed product, and grain purchase quotas imposed by the EC, effective March 1, 1986, are in violation of the GATT. Moreover, the replacement of GATT-bound 20 percent tariffs on corn and grain sorghum imports entering Spain with the EC's variable levy system, which is currently equivalent to a tariff of more than 100 percent, is in violation of previous agreements and international trade rules.

On March 31, President Reagan announced his intention to use existing authority to retaliate against these illegal, trade-restrictive practices of the EC by imposing quotas and tariffs on an equivalent value of EC products entering the United States, including white wine, mineral water, fruit juices, vegetables, and cheese.

I fully endorse the action of the administration to get tough with the Europeans. It exemplifies the President's pronounced "free but fair" trade policy.

Mr. President, I have long urged a more aggressive policy in dealing with the predatory trading practices of our friends across the Atlantic, the European Community. The EC's Common Agricultural Policy has had an extremely detrimental effect on our agricultural exports—to the extent that many international agricultural experts suggest that much of the blame for our current surpluses can be laid at the feet of artificially induced overproduction in the EC.

I sponsored the inclusion of funds in the 1981 farm bill to provide targeted export assistance, expressedly to combat the unfair, predatory trading practices of the European Community. Funding for similar activities was included as part of the 1985 farm bill. In my opinion, this is money well-spent, to reopen international markets where the EC has unfairly closed the door on our exports.

Some senators have noted concern that supporting this resolution would place one on record as opposed to the EC's accession of Spain and Portugal. This is not the case. This resolution is intended to clarify the position of the Congress in this matter and to strengthen the hand of the administration in negotiating a favorable resolution—including Secretary Lyng and Ambassador Yeutter, who will depart for negotiations in Europe tomorrow.

I urge the Senate's support of the resolution.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON EEC TRADE PRACTICES

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor this resolution whose enactment is critical to all sectors of American agriculture, both now and in the future.

This resolution urges the President to use his full authority to retaliate against the new restrictions on grains and oilseeds in Spain and Portugal which adversely affect U.S. exports, unless the United States receives prompt and complete compensation for any loss of trade resulting from the enlargement of the European Community.

In addition, it expresses congressional opposition to the unjustified threat of the European Community to counterretaliate against additional American agricultural products. I applaud the President's courageous and proper decision to stand up for the rights of the American farmer. As noted in the resolution, the EC on March 1 put into place the first transition measures to bring Spanish and Portuguese agricultural policies in line with the Common Agricultural Policy. Some of you may recall the remarks I made on this subject 2 months ago before these new import restrictions went into effect. Many of us subsequently sent a letter to the President last month to urge him to pursue to the fullest extent the American right to compensation under the rules of international trade by preparing and using a comprehensive list of items for retaliation against the European Community.

I am encouraged that the Administration, by announcing possible retaliatory measures, has elected to demonstrate that we will no longer stand idly by and let the American farmer pay the price when the EC decides to add new members. When Secretary Lyng and United States Trade Representative Yeutter go to Brussels this week for 11 hour negotiations, I certainly hope that they will stand firm in their defense of American agriculture. I believe that the passage of this supportive resolution will assist them in their meetings.

No doubt some of my colleagues who are familiar with this issue may wonder why PETE WILSON, a Senator from California, is actively involved in the fight on a grain and soybean issue. There are a number of reasons why. We must support the resolution being offered today because the new EC restrictions immediately threaten $1 billion in American exports—not just grain and soybeans. Ultimately, because the enlargement of the community will affect all sectors of American agriculture, we must support this resolution as a matter of principle: for far too long the EC has abused international agricultural trade rules and American goodwill and gotten away with it.

California knows too well the wrath of EC unfair trade practices aimed at its citrus, canned fruit, and raisin exporters. California walnut and lemon producers were the most recent victims of unjustified EC trade retaliation during last year's pasta war.

Not surprisingly, the EC has again targeted many of California's lucrative products for counterretaliation. This time, wine, prunes, fruit juices, and California's $185 million worth of almond exports to Europe are on the EC's hit list. Although California producers ask nothing more than a fair market in which to compete, once again, they might be the victims of unfair agricultural trade practices by other governments.

In spite of today's resolution, the greatest danger posed to California by the accession of Spain and Portugal is not the quotas on soybeans and the variable levies on grain. California's danger is long-term. Thanks to the subsidies of the Common Agricultural Policy, Spain and Portugal will become the "Californias of Europe," producing and exporting abundant supplies of fruits, nuts and vegetables. But unlike California, Spain and Portugal do not seek a fair market in which to compete. They seek what other EC agricultural producers already receive: open-ended subsidies to grow, process, market and export their fruits, nuts, and vegetables. And as those subsidies flow, Spain and Portugal threaten to strip California exporters of their hard-earned markets in Europe and abroad.

That explains why I feel so strongly about this confrontation which, for now, harms our grain and soybean producers. But unless the EC knows that we do not intend to let our farmers pay the price for the enlargement of the community, our agricultural producers of numerous other commodities may lose many export markets forever.

For these reasons, I urge my colleagues in the Senate to cosponsor this resolution and to vote overwhelmingly for its prompt adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 129) was considered and agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. CON. RES. 129

A concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress in opposition to certain import restrictions imposed by the European Community that adversely affect United States agricultural exports and urging the President to use to the fullest extent his authority to respond to these practices.

Whereas, as part of the terms under which Spain and Portugal joined the European Community in January of this year, the European Community has imposed quotas on oilseeds and oilseed products in Portugal, in violation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT);

Whereas the European Community has imposed a quota requiring that Portugal purchase at least 15.5 percent of its grain from other European Community countries, in violation of the GATT;

Whereas the European Community has replaced GATT-bound 20 percent tariffs on corn and grain sorghum imports entering Spain with the European Community's variable levy system, which is currently equivalent to a tariff of more than 100 percent, before negotiating compensation as agreed to previously and directed by international trade rules;

Whereas the restrictions imposed by the European Community will impair access for a much as $1 billion worth of United States agricultural products to markets in Portugal and Spain and adversely affect the economic livelihood of United States farmers and related industries;

Whereas, despite Cabinet-level approaches to the European Community in recent months, the European Community has been unwilling to rescind the illegal quotas or to compensate the United States for the damage caused by the higher tariffs;

Whereas prior enlargements of the European Community in 1973 and 1981 have adversely affected United States agricultural exports to the Community;

Whereas the President on March 31 announced his intention to use existing authority to respond to the restrictions of the European Community by imposing quotas and tariff increases or by withdrawing tariff bindings to produce equivalent restrictive effects or comparable loss trade on European Community imports into the United States; and

Whereas the President's proposed actions to defend legitimate United States trade interests are consistent with his belief in a free but fair trade policy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that—

(1) the Administration should continue to firmly oppose actions by the European Community to (A) impose quotas on oilseeds and oilseed products in Portugal, (B) impose a grain purchase requirement quota on Portugal, and (C) place variable levies on corn and grain sorghum entering Spain before negotiating compensation; and

(2) unless the European Community rescinds the trade-restrictive measures referred to in clause (1) or the United States receives prompt and complete compensation for any loss of trade resulting from the enlargement of the European Community, the Administration should take actions, such as the President has announced, to impose trade restrictions on a sufficient value of exports of the European Community to the United States to reestablish the balance of concessions under the GATT and other international trade agreements.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit copies of this resolution to the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of the Treasury, the United States Trade Representative, the Head of the Delegation of the European Community to the United States, and the Ambassdors to the United States for each of the member states of the European Community.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ELECTRIC CONSUMER PROTECTION ACT

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I am delighted that the Senate is about to pass S. 426. It has taken us a long time to get to this point—at times I wondered whether we ever would—and although the House of Representatives still must act on the bill reported by the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, and we will undoubtedly have a number of challenging issues to resolve in conference committee, Senate approval of the bill is a great big first step toward enactment this year.

Mr. President, I commend Senator MCCLURE, the distinguished chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, for his leadership, dedication, and unflagging patience, which have been essential to the success of this measure.

It has passed virtually unscathed in the form that it left the committee and, as I have stated here on the floor many times, I think it is a very excellent solution to a very difficult problem.

It is largely a Western problem, but it is a Western problem involving billions of dollars and hundreds of thousands of electric consumers. I think we resolved that in a way consistent with the national interest or, to be more precise, the public interest and those very words "public interest" are used as the principal measure of determining who gets the power from a hydroelectric dam when the license expires.

I think the key, the centerpiece of this legislation, is a very carefully drawn, fair, workable matrix of rules that settle who gets the power or gives a test by which you can measure who should get the power on the expiration of one of these hydroelectric licenses.

I also thank and commend the committee staff members who have worked so long and hard on this bill—Gary Ellsworth, Russ Brown, Jim Beirne of the majority staff, and Mike Harvey and Bill Conway of the minority staff. I point out that Bill Conway joined the minority staff almost exactly 1 year ago. Since that time, he has been "in charge" of S. 426.

I particularly commend Bill for an excellent job for his first time out on a major piece of legislation. I think it is remarkable the excellent job that he has done.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I rise to support this legislation. I plan to vote for this bill because I believe this bill, with the addition of the wheeling amendment that has been agreed to, takes an important step to assure a fair balance between public and private power interests.

I continue to have reservations that the bill is an unwarranted departure from a public policy hammered out in the early 1900's after years of debate.

Then, President Theodore Roosevelt vetoed the companies' attempts to secure the benefits of our country's rivers solely for their own profit.

In 1920 the Congress agreed with this principle, passing the Federal Power Act.

That law, embraced by a bipartisan coalition of Democrats and Republicans, struck a balance between private and public interests.

It established a tie-breaker policy which favored public institutions in the utilization of our waterways. It set the stage for competition in the electric utility industry.

This tie-breaker, which some call hydrolicensing preference, stated that the Federal Government would favor licensing public institutions over private companies if their applications were otherwise equal.

At the time the Federal Power Act was passed, the investor-owned utilities agreed that upon relicensing, States and public institutions would have the opportunity to take over stewardship of these resources so long as their project applications were at least as good as the plans of the investor-owned utility.

Now we are about to undo a 65-year-old policy developed after years of debate.

The policy has not even been tested. To date the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has relicensed something over 130 hydroelectric projects. Only 11 have been contested by public institutions; and those cases are still pending before FERC.

We do not even know if the preference tie-breaker will be used by FERC in deciding these cases.

The preference tie-breaker was established to ensure adequate competition in the electric utility industry. Then, the electric utility industry was in its infancy.

Large parts of the country had yet to enjoy the benefits of electricity.

Municipal electric systems and other public agencies had only begun to organize to provide electric power for their citizenry.

Rural electric cooperatives were not even in existence. It would be another 15 years before Congress created them.

The electric utility industry, by its nature, has an inherently monopolistic character. In passing the Federal Power Act, the Congress and the President wanted to ensure that there would be a hospitable climate for growth.

Our country has always prided itself on its diversity. Diversity is one of our greatest strengths.

It is a concept strongly embraced by the public. A recent poll showed that 59 percent of the public favored a mix of ownership of electric utilities—some public, some private.

The dynamic relationship between the two groups fostered competition. That competition, in turn, meant that consumers would be getting the best possible deal. No company could use its position in the marketplace to gouge consumers.

Now, at a time when we are in a position to see that competition works to benefit all consumers, we are about to dismantle it. Why?

Private owner companies will tell you that this preference tie-breaker in relicensing proceedings will mean a wholesale transfer of hydroelectric licenses from private utilities to municipalities.

The history of relicensing applications shows that simply isn't true.

This fact was recognized in an interview with the Wall Street Transcript. The chief executive officer of the company holding the largest number of private hydroelectric licenses stated as much. He stated that his company expected to prevail in their relicensing hearings.

Why? Because they would propose superior utilization of their hydroelectric sites. I applaud his commitment to providing the best possible use of our rivers' capabilities.

The preference tie-breaker has fostered competition which has benefited all consumers. It is a public policy we need to maintain, not destroy, if we wish to see a healthy electric utility industry.

Then, as now, we need to do everything we can to foster a competitive atmosphere in that sector of our economy.

If anything, the need for this competition is greater now than it was then. Over the last 65 years, there has been a dramatic decrease in the number of private companies serving the public.

There has been a decrease because there is increasing concentration of power among fewer and fewer companies.

Only a few companies control more and more of our country's generating capacity and transmission lines.

This concentration makes it harder for municipalities, public agencies, and rural electric cooperatives to find a competitive power supply and transmission market.

Now, we are about to turn over our Nation's private hydroelectric resources to one sector of the industry and virtually preclude municipalities and public agencies from competing for these resources.

The licensing provisions of the Federal Power Act are working. Both the public interest and the holders of FERC licenses are protected.

No one objected to the 30-year extension of more than 130 licenses.

Only 11 have been challenged and none have changed hands.

While I plan to vote for this legislation, I continue to be concerned about whether or not a fair balance overall is being maintained.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I rise to support passage of S. 426, the Electric Consumers Protection Act of 1985.

At issue in S. 426 is the long-standing Federal policy of public preference. Under preference, when a public and private utility compete for a hydroelectric license, the license goes to the public utility if the applications are otherwise equal. The reason for the public policy is simple: Public resources should be reserved for the public good.

Public preference in licensing of new hydroelectric projects would not be changed under S. 426. When the Federal Power Act was passed in 1920, public preference applied to applications to build dams.

In 1980, FERC, in the Bountiful case, ruled that preference also should be taken into consideration upon the expiration of original licenses. In 1983, however, a new FERC overruled Bountiful and held that preference did not apply to relicensing in the Merwin case. Last October, the D.C. Court of Appeals overturned FERC's decision. The three-judge panel's Merwin decision has been vacated by the full court of appeals.

The bill, as reported by the Energy Committee, gives existing hydroelectric licensees a tie-breaking preference in Federal Energy Regulatory Commission [FERC] hydro relicensing decisions. Under the bill, FERC would be required to renew the expiring licenses unless the Commission determined that a competing application, including one from a public utility, would better serve the public interest.

I want to make it clear that I do not believe that passage of this legislation will prevent a large changeover of private hydro licenses to public utilities in Maine or nationally.

Preference applies only when two competing applications are otherwise equal. In other words, when a case cannot be made that one applicant will do a better job, or more deserves to retain the license than another.

That happens very rarely. As of last month, FERC had issued 96 relicenses, with 10 contested cases and 49 uncontested cases still pending.

Even without this legislation, it appears likely that private utilities will retain 145 of 155 hydro license renewals without a challenge from a private. It is the infrequent hydro license that will be affected by this legislation.

Nonetheless, it is the infrequent license transfer, with its associated costs to the overwhelming majority of electric consumers that concerns me.

Maine's three private utilities, which serve 95 percent of the State's electric consumers, have 32 licensed facilities due to come up for relicensing before 1994. Hydroelectric generation accounts for 20 percent of the State's need, which is about twice the national averge.

It's important to note that no one doubts that economic dislocation will occur from a license transfer; the argument is only over the size of the economic dislocation which will occur. A large percentage of electric consumers will pay; a small minority will benefit.

I do not think that good public policy benefits a small minority at the expense of a large majority in relicensing decisions when no clear benefit can be seen from a license transfer.

The standard that should be used to judge the issuing of hydro licenses is the determination of who will utilize the public resource in a manner that provides the greatest good to the public.

If a change in ownership of a licensed facility would increase the public benefit to be had from a site, that should be apparent before the preference consideration comes into play. If a clear determination cannot be made, it makes economic sense to leave the license in the hands of the original licensee.

The debate in the Senate on this legislation has centered, as it should, on the issue of public preference in relicensing cases. I think it's important to point out the significant improvements made by the committee in its deliberations.

Those include: the new environmental requirement for FERC to consider in all new license and relicensing applications and the requirements for FERC to examine how proposed hydroprojects would mesh with comprehensive river-basin plans drawn up by State and regional authorities. I have twice introduced legislation addressing FERC's present inadequate efforts in licensing projects according to comprehensive plans so that I believe this is a particularly good addition to the bill.

I am concerned, however, that amendments added to the legislation during floor debate last week have seriously undermined the bill's environmental requirements. I am hopeful that stronger language that clearly protects these valuable resources will be added in conference with the House.

I believe the leadership of the Energy Committee, Senator MCCLURE and Senator JOHNSTON, share that concern with me and other Senators. I look forward to seeing those improvements made in an otherwise very good piece of legislation.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, first of all I would like to thank the members of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources for their hard work on S. 426, the Electric Consumers Protection Act of 1985. The distinguished chairman of the committee, Senator MCCLURE, and the ranking minority member, Senator JOHNSTON, are to be commended for their efforts in bringing this piece of legislation to the floor.

CLARIFYING THE AMBIGUITIES

The passage of this legislation helps put an end to the uncertainty that has existed as to the interpretation of the Federal Power Act of 1920. The ambiguity as to whether or not States and municipalities have a preference in the relicensing of hydroelectric facilities has created uncertainty, both in the minds of Board members of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and members of the judiciary. This bill will allow those who presently receive the benefits of low-cost hydropower to continue to receive those benefits unless a competing application is proven to be better. It will also give some consideration to the economic disruption that would occur should a license suddenly be transferred to a new entity.

INVESTOR-OWNED UTILITIES SERVE THE PUBLIC

I know there are some who claim that we are giving away public resources to the investor-owned utilities. However, Mr. President, let's not lose sight of the fact that the customers of these investor-owned utilities deserve the right to benefit from low electric rates just as much as those served by municipally owned utilities. These investor-owned utilities competed against the States and municipalities to attain their initial licenses. Yanking the licenses now, because of a legislatively mandated preference for the States and municipalities, would certainly result in higher rates being paid by those currently being served by the investor-owned utilities.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, this is not an issue of municipalities versus those who receive their service from investor-owned facilities. This legislation simply gives investor-owned utilities the chance to compete in an open market without establishing any preference for either party. It gives those customers being served by investor-owned utilities a fair chance to keep their current utility rates.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to adopt S. 426 in an effort to clarify Federal policies governing the licensing of hydroelectric facilities.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I would like to make a few closing remarks upon the passage of S. 426, as amended, by the Senate. In my opening remarks, I stated my belief that this bill should address the broader questions of the optimal use of a valuable public resource—water. I think that we have made some progress toward addressing such broader concerns, in both the amendments adopted in the Energy and Natural Resources Committee and on the floor. But we still have quite a way to go.

On the whole, I think this bill is the best package that we can get out of the Energy Committee and the Senate at this time. But the House has taken quite a different approach in its bill, H.R. 44, that was reported out of the Energy and Commerce Committee toward many key elements in hydro relicensing. We head into a difficult but important conference committee. I'm not going to predict how long such a conference will take and what the likely outcome will be. But I think it's fair to state that it will be a lively and contentious conference. I am supporting this bill based on the recognition of such a conference and the likelihood that key elements of the bill will probably be modified at that time. Thus I have refrained from offering several amendments that I had prepared for consideration on the floor.

Let me summarize what positive things I believe that S. 426 has accomplished:

Clarification of the contentious issue of municipal preference in relicensing proceedings in section 15 of the Federal Power Act, which is an issue that we, as responsible Members of Congress, have to address squarely and resolve;

Reduction of the statutory license term, in principle, from 50 to 30 years, allowing each generation the chance to review the project's use of water as a valuable public resource;

Explicit reference of adequate protection, mitigation, and enhancement of fish and wildlife in the section 10(a) public interest standard;

Obligation of FERC to consider seriously:

Consistency of the project with State or regional comprehensive plans, such as the Northwest Power Council's 20-Year Power Plan and the Columbia River Fish and Wildlife Program; recommendations of the relevant Federal and State agencies regarding the project, as well as those of the affected Indian tribes; the plans of a utility applicant for energy conservation programs.

On the other hand, I believe the bill has shortcomings in the following areas. These are subjects that I would hope the conference committee would seriously address and make improvements:

First, PURPA benefits: In general, I would have preferred stronger language that would have denied the generous PURPA 210 benefits to all new small hydro projects. I introduced an amendment to that effect on the floor, No. 1777, but withdrew it after consulting with Chairman McCLURE. I am concerned with both the environmental harm caused by the explosion of applications for licenses and preliminary permits in the Pacific Northwest, as well as the economic aspects of requiring utilities to purchase power from qualified small power producers under all circumstances.

More specifically, I am quite concerned that the PURPA grandfather clause that we adopted—amendment No. 1775—is too broad. This could exempt as many as 500 projects from the provisions of this legislation. I am sympathetic to the notion that the rules shouldn't be changed in midstream to investors who relied on them in developing certain projects. But, as I stated for the RECORD on April 11, I believe that providing an exception for preliminary permits allows many applicants who have spent next to nothing to escape the purview of the provisions in S. 426. Furthermore, it is important to keep in mind that S. 426 doesn't deny the PURPA 210 benefits to small hydro projects; it merely requires that applicants meet the terms and conditions established by fish and wildlife agencies. But I am satisfied with the assurances from Chairman McCLURE that we went too far with this grandfather amendment and that it will be resolved in the conference committee.

Second, regional nature of certain projects. Chairman McCLURE and I engaged in a colloquy on April 11, also, which stressed the need to consider the regional aspects of certain hydroelectric projects in the Pacific Northwest. Specifically, these refer to certain large hydroelectric dams on the mid-Columbia River that were developed in the 1950's with non-Federal financing when the Federal Government decided not to appropriate further moneys to build Columbia River dams. Certain public utilities, with the assistance long-term purchase contracts from private utilities, took great financial risks in developing these huge projects. They have become vital to the economic prosperity of the region they serve. Due to the reference to relative economic impact on each applicant in section 15(b) of the bill, I want to ensure that adequate protection is given to the region in which such projects are located by the FERC during a relicensing proceeding.

Third, fish and wildlife protection: Generally, I think we have made a good start with the provisions adopted in S. 426. Explicit reference of adequate protection, mitigation, and enhancement in section 10(a) was a good step forward. In some cases, however, the House has gone further and has differed in emphasis. This is one area where the conference committee will need to work hard to resolve the House and Senate differences.

Fourth, replacement power: This is a vague concept that can be subject to a great deal of misinterpretation. The larger issue of compensation to an existing licensee who loses its license in a relicensing proceeding is a very difficult one. I struggled with this issue for a long time before introducing one concept in my bill, S. 1260. We should keep in mind, however, that the issue of replacement power must be considered in the context of the overall bill. In this sense, S. 426, as amended, provides the incumbent licensee with a strong preference in relicensing but doesn't provide any level of compensation, in the event the incumbent loses its license, beyond the level of net depreciated investment plus severance damages. My concern here is that the existing licensee will try to raise its estimate of its replacement power to an artificially high level in order to protect its license.

In summary, I wish to thank the floor managers of the bill, Chairman McCLURE and Senator JOHNSTON, for their courtesies to me during consideration of this bill in committee and on the floor. I have taken a strong interest in this bill due to its enormous impact on the State of Washington. I look forward to working with them and their staffs as S. 426 and H.R. 44 now go to the conference committee.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, last night the Senate agreed to an amendment offered by the Senator from Montana which would clarify that the provisions of section 211(c)(2)(B) do not prevent an applicant from filing for a wheeling order prior to the time at which a rate on file with the Commission actually terminates. Given the hour, I thought that I would not join in the discussion since all parties were in agreement as to the intent and effect of the amendment. As the sponsor of this legislation, I do want the record to reflect that I fully agree with the analysis given last night and especially with the comments of the Senator from Louisiana who also introduced legislation on this subject and who I worked closely with to develop the particular approach which the committee brought to the floor.

I want the record to be absolutely clear that the only thing the amendment does is clarify that an application can be filed prior to the termination of a rate schedule pursuant to the term of the schedule and by order of the Commission. It only clarifies that an applicant does not have to go "cold turkey" before he can even file. The amendment does not, and I want to repeat, not, make any substantive change in the requirements of sections 211 or 212 which must be satisfied before a wheeling order can issue. It also does not in any way affect, lessen, or modify the standards, criteria, restrictions, requirements, procedures, or practices under sections 205 or 206 for modifications or termination of a rate schedule.

If a utility has a rate schedule on file, which would expire 10 years from now, the utility which is receiving energy can file for a wheeling order tomorrow which, if granted, would go into effect 10 years from now. Section 211(c)(2)(B) does not act as a bar to the filing of such a request. Section 211(c)(2)(B) does continue to act as a bar to such an order being issued and going into effect however prior to termination in 10 years in accordance with the terms of the rate and by order of the Commission. It seems to me that such a filing is premature and the Commission probably has better things to do than considering wheeling orders for 10 years from now, but I see no reason why a utility should not be able to simply file.

Such a filing does not in any way serve as a basis for contract abrogation, modification, cancellation, or termination. The provisions of sections 205 and 206 are unaffected by this amendment or any action taken pursuant to it. The timing of filing has absolutely nothing to do with whether an order will meet the requirements of the Federal Power Act.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, before passage of S. 426, I wish to express my appreciation to those who are responsible for resolving this issue. Although I fully support this measure and am pleased to be able to manage it, this legislation is properly credited to both Senator WALLOP and Senator JOHNSTON. They began this process with two different approaches to the issue of relicensing, but they devoted the time and their considerable skills to develope this legislation.

I also wish to express my appreciation to Senator MURKOWSKI, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Water and Power, who brought the legislation to the full committee with an exceptional hearing record. Senator METZENBAUM has also been extremely cooperative. I still believe that his amendment is irrelevant to the issue at hand, but I am grateful for the time and effort which he and his staff, especially Doug Lowenstein and Eddie Correia, devoted to resolve their concerns in a way which would not impede passage of this legislation.

Finally, I thank the members of the staff who worked on this legislation; Mike Harvey, our committee's minority counsel; Bill Conway of the minority staff; Frank Cushing, Gary Ellsworth, Jim Beirne, Dave Doane, Howard Useem, and Russ Brown of the committee staff. Their time and effort greatly assisted the committee and the Senate in reaching this point. I also thank Lynn Monroe of Senator WALLOP's staff and Art Noonan of Senator MELCHER's staff for their valuable contributions.

ROLE OF STATE WATER LAW IN FERC LICENSES

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I was prepared to offer amendments to S. 426 to require FERC licensees to conform to State water law. My amendments would have provided that prospective water power projects must obtain water rights under State law before obtaining a FERC license; that FERC cannot authorize exercise of eminent domain powers to obtain water rights; and that FERC license terms cannot be inconsistent with terms of the State water use authorization.

I believe that section 27 of the original Federal Power Act articulated Congress' intent not to preempt State water law. Instead, under the Supreme Court's current interpretation of the law, FERC is only required to consider State resource plans and the recommendations of appropriate State agencies when evaluating license applications.

With the recent proliferation of applications for FERC licenses, there is growing concern about how new water projects could affect State resource plans and existing water rights. My amendments would require FERC licensees to obtain water rights under State laws and State procedures, and would prevent situations where FERC licensees might deprive a rancher or other water user, either upstream or downstream, of his established water rights.

For example, under current law FERC could grant a license to site a project on a river which has been fully adjudicated among current users. The FERC license would upset the State adjudication, and the licensee could force a rancher or other water user to sell his water right. In addition, it is unclear how interstate compacts and compacts with Indian tribes could be affected by FERC licensing decisions; based on Supreme Court interpretations of current law, it appears that a FERC licensing decision could affect such compact agreements. These possibilities are critically important to many States, tribes, and individual water users; they raise serious questions about States' rights and the appropriate role of FERC, and I think they warrant immediate investigations.

I am aware, Mr. President, of the controversial nature of these amendments. This is a complicated area of law. I have discussed my proposals with the distinguished chairman of the Energy Committee, and he has agreed to hold a hearing on this matter during this Congress so that the committee can consider the proper role of State water law in FERC licensing procedures.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana is correct. I share his concerns about how these power projects affect State resource planning. I agree that the committee should examine his proposals and the effects of preemption on State resource planning and existing water compacts.

I appreciate the Senator's cooperation in not offering his amendments for full Senate consideration at this time, and I can assure him that I will work with him and schedule a hearing at an appropriate time during this Congress.

Mr. BAUCUS. I thank the Senator. With that understanding, I will not offer my amendments today to S. 426. I look forward to working with the chairman and with other members of the Energy Committee in exploring these important issues.

Mr. President, these amendments are supported by the Western States Water Council. I ask unanimous consent that a resolution adopted by the council appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POSITION OF THE WESTERN STATES WATER COUNCIL CONCERNING AMENDMENT OF THE FEDERAL POWER ACT

Whereas, needless controversy has been caused by conflicts between the licensing procedures of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (FERC) and established principles of Western States water law; and

Whereas, FERC has been unwilling to modify its procedures to relieve these conflicts:

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Western States Water Council that the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 791(a) et seq.) be amended as follows:

1. Strike from subsection ((b) the following language ". . . and to the appropriation, diversion, and use of water for power purposes . . ." Add the following new subsection after subsection (c):

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the commission is prohibited from issuing an original or new license, amendment to license, or exemption from licensing under this Part, unless the applicant proves acquisition, in accordance with applicable substantive and procedural provisions of state law, of the necessary rights established pursuant to state law to appropriate, divert, and use water for power purposes."

2. To Section 21 add the following new sentence:

"The commission is not empowered to authorize a licensee to exercise the right of eminent domain pursuant to this section for the purpose of acquiring water rights."

3. In Section 27 designate the existing sentence as subsection (a) and add the following additional subsections:

"(b) Nothing in this Part shall be construed as conferring upon the United States, its agents, permittees, or licensees any right to acquire rights to appropriate, divert, or use water.

(c) Appropriation of water for power purposes subject to this Part shall be pursuant to substantive and procedural provisions of State statutory law, decisional law, and regulations governing appropriation, diversion and use of water.

(d) Establishment of, and compliance with, pursuant to State law, terms or conditions, including licenses, or other entitlements for appropriation, diversion or use of water for power purposes, shall not be deemed to constitute a burden on interstate commerce.

(e) Nothing in this Part shall alter in any way any provision of State statutory law, decisional law, or regulation, or of any interstate compact, governing the appropriation, diversion, or use of water."

4. To Section 6 add the following provision after the second sentence:

"The commission is not empowered to impose any terms or conditions in any original or new license or amendment to license which are inconsistent with the terms and conditions established pursuant to State law in any permit, license, or other entitlement for appropriation, diversion, or use of water for the project authorized by the license or amendment."

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that any Senator may put a statement in the RECORD with respect to S. 426 during the balance of the day, and that it be entered in the RECORD immediately prior to the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the Electric Consumers Protection Act presents problems for municipal and rural electric cooperative consumers in Pennsylvania. I support S. 426, but I do so with some wariness about the future effect of its passage.

I am concerned that the alteration of the relicensing preference may provide the impetus for the elimination of all preferencing, especially as it applies to the marketing of hydroelectric power under various statutes. This would not be in the best interests of Pennsylvania's electric consumers.

Since 1966, for instance, Pennsylvania's rural electric cooperatives have benefited from low-cost hydroelectic power generated by the Power Authority of New York under the Federal license granted to it in the Niagara Redevelopment Act, drafted among others by Pennsylvania Senator Joe Clark. That license provides that a percentage of the power generated at the project must be sold to out-of-State preference customers. Since 1966, this low-cost power has saved rural electric cooperative members $175 million over what they would otherwise have had to pay for power. This arrangement serves as a fine example of the preference clause in action, granting the public customer the first right of refusal.

I also have reservations about the anticompetitive aspects of this legislation. In a circumstance similar to this one, under the Atomic Energy Act, municipalities have a right to bring their antitrust concerns to the attention of the Federal Government. For this reason, I am today cosponsoring Senator METZENBAUM's amendment, which will provide for a review of the anticompetitive effects of an investor-owned utility's assumption of a hydroelectric license.

The impact of this legislation on the preference clause and the competitiveness of hydroelectric relicensing are two issues which will continue to command my attention. I am hopeful that my colleagues will share my concern, and I look forward to working with them to ensure that the interests of electric consumers continue to be protected.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, S. 426, the Electric Consumers Protection Act, clarifies Federal regulation of hydroelectric development. It also strengthens protection of fish and wildlife resources which can be adversely affected by hydroelectric development. I believe that these are valid reasons for passing this bill.

Last Friday, however, the Senate passed an amendment, with virtually no debate, which undermined one of the important improvements in the bill. Section 10 of the committee bill established a new requirement that power production facilities at new hydroelectric dams meet terms and conditions established by fish and wildlife agencies if they are to receive financial benefits under section 210 of the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act. Section 10, then, would eliminate Federal incentives which have been resulting in an adverse impact on our Nation's rivers and the important fish and wildlife resources which utilize these rivers for habitat.

The Senate voted last Friday, however, to exempt projects from the requirement to comply with fish and wildlife agency conditions to protect fish and wildlife when an application for a hydroelectric facility had been filed prior to April 11, 1986. This amendment, which grandfathered numerous projects from the new section 10 requirement, significantly weakens the environmental protections contained in the bill.

I understand that both Senators EVANS and HATFIELD have received assurances from Senator MCCLURE, chairman of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, that he will work to narrow the scope of the grandfather provision during the conference committee deliberations on this bill. I am voting for S. 426 based on these assurances.

AMENDMENT NO. 1792, S. 426

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, last night, the Senate agree to my amendment No. 1792. As the author, I want to clearly state the purpose and intent of amendment No. 1792. The purpose of my amendment is to clarify the intent of a particularly ambiguous provision of PURPA. Section 211(c)(2)(B) of PURPA was confusing and in need of clarification. The amendment makes clear that a wheeling application may be filed prior to termination or modification of an existing rate schedule at the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission [FERC] and that wheeling under this section becomes effective at the time of the termination or modification of the rate schedule. The amendment permits FERC to issue a wheeling order which would become effective at the time of the modification or termination of a rate schedule. Thus, the fact that a rate schedule is on file at FERC would not preclude FERC action on a wheeling application. Moreover, nothing in this amendment or section is intended to alter in any way the existing law as to sections 205 and 206 of the Federal Power Act.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we do have a vote set at noon. I know there is at least one Member on each side that would rather have it later, but I do not know what we can do about it because there is objection to doing it later.

I do wish to thank the managers of the bill and the committee staff who have worked so hard. I thank the distinguished chairman of the committee, Senator MCCLURE, and the distinguished manager on the Democratic side, Senator JOHNSTON, for their patience and their effort.

We had a number of votes yesterday which I believe strengthened their hand in conference. Not being an expert on this bill, I am not certain what the issue ever was, if there was an issue. I know there were votes.

It is good that we will finish the bill today because we are getting into sort of heavy water here in the Legislative Calendar. Had we not been able to conclude it today, it may have been some time before we would have been able to return to it.

But, in any event, I thank my colleagues for their patience. I believe they were able to satisfy, to some degree, the concerns expressed by the Senator from Montana, Senator MELCHER.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

ELECTRIC CONSUMERS PROTECTION ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending bill.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 426) to amend the Federal Power Act to provide for more protection to electric consumers.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Announced that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. ABDNOR] and the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] are necessarily absent.

I also announced that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is absent due to illness.

On this vote, the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. ABDNOR].

If present and voting, the Senator from Florida would vote "yea" and the Senator from South Dakota would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. WILSON). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 83, nays 14, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 75 Leg.]

So the bill (S. 426), as amended was passed, as follows:

S. 426

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be referred to as the "Electric Consumers Protection Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 7(a) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 800(a)), as amended, is further amended—

(a) by inserting "original" after "hereunder or"; and

(b) by striking "and in issuing licenses to new licensees under section 15 hereof".

SEC. 3. Section 10 of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 803), as amended, is further amended—

(a) in existing subsection (a) after "water power development,", by inserting "for the adequate protection, mitigation, and enhancement of fish and wildlife,";

(b) in existing subsection (a) after "including", by inserting "irrigation, flood control, water supply and"; and

(c) by redesignating existing subsection (a) as paragraph (a)(1) and by inserting the following new paragraphs:

"(2) In order to ensure that the project adopted will be best adapted to the comprehensive plan described in paragraph (a)(1), the Commission shall consider:

"(A) the extent to which the project is consistent with a comprehensive plan (where one exists) for improving, developing, or conserving a waterway or waterways affected by the project that is prepared by—

"(i) an agency established pursuant to Federal law that has the authority to prepare such a plan; and

"(ii) the State in which the facility is or will be located; and

"(B) the recommendations of Federal and State agencies exercising administration over fish and wildlife, flood control, navigation, irrigation, recreation, and cultural resources of the State in which the project is located, and the recommendations of Indian tribes affected by the project; and

"(C) if the applicant is an electric utility, its plans for energy conservation through energy efficiency programs.

"(3)(A) Upon receipt of an application for a license, the Commission shall solicit recommendations from the agencies and Indian tribes identified in paragraph (a)(2) of this section for proposed terms and conditions for the Commission's consideration for inclusion in the license;

"(B) If any recommendation for a proposed term or condition is received by the Commission within one hundred and twenty days of the public notice of any license application under this section, the Commission shall explain in writing its reasons for adopting, rejecting or modifying any such proposed term or condition.".

SEC. 4. Section 15 of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 808), as amended, is further amended—

(a) by striking subsection (a) through "terms and conditions to a new licensee," and inserting in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 15(a). If the United States does not, at the expiration of the existing license, exercise its right to take over, maintain and operate any project or projects of the licensee, as provided in section 14 of this Act, the Commission may issue a new license to the existing licensee upon such terms and conditions, taking into account existing structures and facilities, as may be authorized or required under the then existing laws and regulations, or to another applicant under said terms and conditions. If the existing licensee applies for a new license, the Commission shall issue a new license to such existing licensee unless the Commission determines that the plans of another applicant are better adopted to serve the public interest. If the existing licensee does not apply for a new license, the Commission shall issue a new license to the applicant the plans of which are best adapted to serve the public interest. In either case, the Commission shall not issue a license unless it is satisfied that (1) the applicant is able to carry out such plans and (2) the plans represent a cost effective approach to achieving the benefits to be derived therefrom.

"(b) The Commission shall make its determination of which plans are best adopted to serve the public interest on the basis of—

"(1) how each plan would develop, conserve, and utilize the water resources of the region in accordance with the provisions of section 10(a) of this Act;

"(2) the relative economic impact upon customers served by each applicant upon the failure of such applicant to receive the license, including an assessment of the economic impact upon the customers of an applicant that is the existing licensee that would result from the difference between the compensation to be paid under subsection (c) of this section and the cost of replacement power;

"(3) the economic impact, in the case of a nonutility license holder, upon the operation and efficiency of the dependent industrial facility or related activity, its existing employees, and the surrounding community, if the existing licensee fails to receive the new license;

"(4) the ability of each applicant to operate and maintain the project in a manner most likely to provide efficient, reliable eletric service; and

"(5) the need of each applicant for the electricity generated by the project or projects to serve its existing customers including customers served by any electric utility which receives power from the existing licensee.";

(b) by redesignating the remainder of subsection (a) as subsection (c);

(c) by striking "which license" and inserting in lieu thereof "A license issued under this section";

(d) by redesignating existing subsection (b) as subsection (d);

(e) by adding a new subsection:

"(e) A new license may only be issued for a period not to exceed thirty years unless the Commission determines that a longer period is necessary due to substantial new construction or significant redevelopment of the project in question. In no case shall a new license be issued for a period of more than fifty years."; and

(f) by adding a new subsection:

"(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, for projects using tribal lands embraced within Indian reservations, the original license for which was issued prior to October 1, 1985 and for which a new license has not yet become effective by such date, the Commission shall not consider the factors set forth in sections 15(b)(2) and 15(b)(5) in evaluating the plans of Indian tribes to which such lands belong that apply for a new license.".

SEC. 5. The amendments made by this Act shall not apply to any relicensing proceeding in which the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has issued an order awarding a new license on or before July 31, 1985, regardless of whether such order is subject to judicial review, nor shall they operate to diminish the amount of the annual charge to be paid pursuant to section 10(e) of the Federal Power Act to Indian tribes for the use of their lands within Indian reservations.

SEC. 6. Section 30 of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 824), as amended, is further amended by striking subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Exemptions granted under subsection (a) of this section shall be granted for a period not to exceed thirty years unless the Commission determines that a longer period is necessary due to substantial new construction or significant redevelopment of the project in questions. In no case shall an exemption be granted for a period of more than fifty years. The Commission may not grant any such exemption to any facility the installed capacity of which exceeds 15 megawatts.".

SEC. 7. Section 405 of the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act of 1978 (16 U.S.C. 2705), as amended, is further amended in subsection (d) by inserting at the end thereof: "Exemptions shall be granted for a period not to exceed thirty years unless the Commission determines that a longer period is necessary due to substantial new construction or significant redevelopment of the project in question. In no case shall an exemption be issued for a period of more than fifty years."

SEC. 8. Section 6 of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 799), as amended, is further amended after "fifty years" by inserting "unless the Commission determines a shorter period is desirable".

SEC. 9. The amendments made by sections 6 and 7 of this Act shall apply only to exemptions granted after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 10. Section 3(17) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 796(17)), as amended, is further amended—

(a) by adding a new paragraph (B) as follows:

"(B) Notwithstanding paragraph (A), no hydroelectric project shall be considered a small power production facility (other than for purposes of section 210(e) of the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act of 1978) if such project impounds or diverts the water of a natural watercourse other than by means of an existing dam or diversion, unless:

"(i) such project is located at a Government dam; or

"(ii) such project meets terms and conditions set by fish and wildlife agencies under the same procedure as provided for under section 30(c) of the Federal Power Act;

"(iii) for the purposes of this paragraph, the term 'existing dam or diversion' means any dam or diversion that is part of a project for which a license has been issued on or before the enactment of this paragraph, or which the Commission determines does not require any construction or enlargement of impound structures (other than repairs or reconstruction) except for the addition of flashboards (or similar adjustable devices);"; and

(b) by redesignating the existing paragraphs.

SEC. 11. The amendments made by section 10 of this Act shall not apply to any hydroelectric project for which an application for a license or preliminary permit was filed with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission on or before April 11, 1986.

SEC. 12. Section 26 of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 820), as amended, is further amended—

(a) by redesignating existing section 26 as "section 26(a)"; and

(b) by adding the following new subsections:

"(b) The Commission may—

"(1) after opportunity for a hearing on the record revoke for significant violation of its terms any permit, license, or exemption issued pursuant to this Act, whether granted under this Act or another provision of law;

"(2) issue such other orders as it deems necessary to ensure compliance with the provisions of this part, or of any lawful regulation or order promulgated thereunder, or of any permit, license, or exemption issued pursuant to this Act, whether granted under this Act or another provision of law.

"(c) The Commission may institute proceedings in the district court of the United States in the district in which the project or part thereof is situated for the purpose of enforcing an order of the Commission under subsection (b) of this section. The court shall have the same powers as provided for under subsection (a) of this section.".

(c) Section 13 of the Federal Power Act, as amended, is further amended by striking the final sentence thereof.

(d) Section 26(a) of the Federal Power Act, as amended, is further amended—

(1) by striking the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following sentence: "The Commission, or the Attorney General on request of the Commission or of the Secretary of the Army, may institute proceedings in equity in the district court of the United States in the district in which any project or part thereof is situated for the purpose of revoking for significant violation of its terms any permit or license issued hereunder or any exemption from any requirement of this Act, whether granted under this Act or another provision of law, or for the purpose of remedying or correcting by injunction, mandamus, or other process any act of commission or omission in violation of the provisions of this Act or of any lawful regulation or order promulgated hereunder."; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "In the case of revocation of an exemption from any requirement of this Act, whether granted under this Act or another provision of law, the courts may exercise the same powers as they have under this section with respect to revocation of a license.".

(e) Section 402(a)(2)(A) of the Department of Energy Organization Act, as amended, is further amended by inserting between "4," and "301" the following: "5, 13, 26, 30,".

(f) The amendments made by this section shall apply to licenses, permits, exemptions, rules, regulations, and orders issued before, on, or after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 13. Nothing in this Act shall be construed as authorizing the appropriation of water by any Federal, State, or local agency, Indian tribe, or any other entity or individual. Nor shall any provision of this Act—

(a) affect the rights or jurisdictions of the United States, the States, Indian tribes, or other entities over waters of any river or stream or over any groundwater resource,

(b) alter, amend, repeal, interpret, modify, or be in conflict with any interstate compact made by the States, or

(c) otherwise be construed to alter or establish the respective rights of States, the United States, Indian tribes, or any person with respect to any water or water-related right.

SEC. 14. Section 10(h) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 803(h)) is amended by redesignating section 10(h) as 10(h)(1) and adding a new section 10(h)(2) as follows:

"(2) That conduct under the license that: A) results in the contravention of the policies expressed in the antitrust laws; and B) is not otherwise justified by the public interest considering regulatory policies expressed in other applicable law (including but not limited to those contained in Part II of this Act) shall be prevented or adequately minimized by means of conditions included in the license prior to its issuance. In the event it is impossible to prevent or adequately minimize the contravention, the Commission shall refuse to issue the license to the applicant."

SEC. 15. Section 4(e) of the Federal Power Act (16 U.S.C. 797(e)) is amended—

(a) by striking "And provided further" and inserting in lieu thereof "Provided further"; and

(b) by striking the final period "." and inserting in lieu thereof the following: ": And provided further, That upon the filing of any application for a license the Commission shall seek to notify by certified mail the owner or owners of the property within the bounds of the project, and any State, municipality or other local governmental entity likely to be interested in or affected by such application.".

SEC. 16. Section 211(c)(2)(B) of the Federal Power Act is amended by adding before the period the following: ": Provided, That nothing in this subparagraph shall prevent an application for an order hereunder to be filed prior to termination or modification of an existing rate schedule: Provided, That such order shall not become effective until termination of such rate schedule or the modification becomes effective".

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I think it is obvious from the nature of the controversy that surrounded this measure not only in committee but on the floor that staff has done an extraordinary job. That is true of staff on the minority side as well as the majority staff for the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. I very much appreciate the cooperation particularly of both Senators WALLOP and the distinguished ranking minority Member, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JOHNSTON]. Both Senator WALLOP and Senator JOHNSTON were principal sponsors of legislation that was merged to bring this bill to the floor at this time. I very much appreciate their cooperation.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. ABDNOR] would have voted "no" had he been here, but his plane, as happens to some of us from time to time, was unable to land. He should have been here about 11:45, but bad weather is sometimes a nemesis. In this case it was for Senator ABDNOR. He will have a statement for the record.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is my hope now that we can move to the consideration—I will not make that motion yet—of technical amendments to the crime bill. I have discussed this with the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee. Senator HELMS has an interest in it also. He would like to offer one amendment. There is information on the way to the floor for certain principals involved in that particular action. So, as soon as the information is available and Senator THURMOND and Senator BIDEN are here, I would hope we might move to that bill. As I understand it, it will not take any length of time.

I am advised by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee that he is not prepared to move to the bankruptcy judges bill, which means that bill may not be seen again for 60 or 90 days. In any event, there are objections to bringing that bill up from at least two Senators on the committee.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield? I believe the majority leader indicated earlier this morning he was going to have a meeting on the other side of the Capitol around 1 o'clock. Will he be able to state upon his return as to whether or not the budget resolution will be laid down?

Mr. DOLE. That meeting is scheduled for tomorrow, Friday, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. BYRD. Could the distinguished majority leader indicate whether or not there is a good possibility that he will lay the budget resolution down tomorrow? He had indicated earlier that he might, and I hope he can do that.

Also, I will ask one further question: What does he see in store for Monday, if he is able to state it at this point? He indicated earlier that there would be no rollcall votes tomorrow. Senators may base their programming for the weekend in their home States according, therefore, and it would be helpful if we could be told whether or not there will be rollcall votes on Monday. So, would votes be before 3 o'clock or after 4 o'clock, or whatever?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we are trying to put together a schedule for Monday that would not require rollcall votes. Obviously, we do not want a rollcall just to have a rollcall.

There are two or three minor bills we may be able to do early Monday, and I will contact the minority leader about those. I am not yet prepared to say that there will be no votes; but if there were votes, I assume they would come sometime after 2:30.

Mr. BYRD. Would the majority leader be in a better position to discuss this a little later today, so that those who may be making their reservations to leave this evening can take advantage of the opportunity to be in their States tomorrow, so that they could plan their Monday schedule?

Mr. DOLE. I do not know which Senators may be involved in the bills we are looking at. If they can help us, unless there is some strong reason why they cannot let it go by a voice vote, that would be helpful and would make our decision much easier.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

I will inquire further this afternoon as to the prospects for Monday, if the distinguished leader will be prepared to respond at that time.

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., FEDERAL HOLIDAY COMMISSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the bill extending the Martin Luther King Commission has been cleared on the other side, and it is now cleared on this side. On behalf of myself, and Senators KENNEDY, D'AMATO, MATHIAS, and HOLLINGS, I send the bill to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2319) to provide for the continuation of the Martin Luther King, Jr., Holiday Commission until 1989, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BYRD. There is no objection, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join in cosponsoring this legislation which would extend the life of the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission for 3 years. I have been pleased to serve on this Commission over the past year during the historic first celebration of the King Federal holiday. The Commission has done much good work, but more can be done to promote the spirit of equality and justice which our new holiday represents.

It should be emphasized that no Federal money is appropriated for the Commission; rather, it operates entirely on donated funds. Over the past year, a number of businesses and organizations have contributed money to the work of the Commission and under the extension legislation, the Commission would continue to be funded from these sources.

In addition to extending the life of the Commission for 3 years, this bill would expand the number of Commission members to enable a broader range of the populace to be represented. Expanding the size of the Commission should also enhance its ability to raise private sector funds.

Mr. President, I have very much enjoyed working with Mrs. King and members of the King family on this worthwhile cause. I believe last January's celebration was a fine success and demonstrates that the Holiday Commission deserves to be continued.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it is a privilege for me to introduce this legislation, cosponsored by Senators D'AMATO, DOLE, MATHIAS, and HOLLINGS, to extend the Martin Luther King, Jr. Federal Holiday Commission for 3 additional years.

We do so because, despite the extraordinary nationwide success of the first King celebration last January, there is still much to be done.

Let us remember again why we honor Dr. King. With this national holiday, he took his place as the founding father of the second American revolution, the revolution of civil rights.

At a time when our Nation was paying lipservice to liberty but ignoring ingrained generations of injustice—Martin Luther King's simple irresistible message of "Freedom Now" called America to witness the discrimination in our midst, and to embrace the enduring principle of equality—not just in the promise of the Constitution, but in the reality of our daily lives. He stripped the scales of racism from our eyes, and showed us the scales of justice.

The urgency and the power of his message of peaceful change could not be denied. He awakened the dormant conscience of our country. Now is the time, he said, for civil rights. Now is the time for the right to vote. Now is the time for human rights in this land—and in every place on Earth.

Because Martin Luther King lived, millions of Americans were set free at last from the cruel iron shackles of centuries of segregation. Because he dreamed, millions found that their own dream of a better life could be achieved.

He liberated whites as well as blacks—for in the end, racism always imprisons those on both sides of the color bar.

The meaning of the first Martin Luther King holiday is clear. The dream is still on the march. The faith of Dr. King is still moving the mountains of injustice and discrimination.

In celebrating his birthday as a national holiday, we are also mindful of the tragic circumstances that took Dr. King from us so young, when he still had so much to do. We are mindful of the difficulty of the journey that lies ahead—and the courage that each of us must summon anew, to put aside complacency and appeals to narrow interest, and complete for our time and for all time the pilgrimage that he began.

President Kennedy, in his inaugural address in 1961, proclaimed that the torch of leadership had passed to a new generation of Americans, unwilling to permit the slow undoing of those human rights to which this Nation has always been committed. And Martin Luther King, Jr. became America's greatest leader in that cause.

The Martin Luther King, Jr. Holiday Commission, created in 1983, performed a valuable service to the Nation in laying the groundwork for the first observance of the holiday this year. Its success can be measured in many ways: 37 States and 3 territories established their own holiday commissions to commemorate Dr. King in their jurisdictions; 40 States and 4 territories enacted an official State or territorial holiday, parallel to the Federal holiday; over 1 million Americans signed "I have a Dream" pledge cards, recommitting themselves to Dr. King's dream; and over 30 million Americans viewed the NBC entertainment tribute to Dr. King last January 20.

The Commission, so ably chaired by Coretta Scott King, who has done so much to keep Dr. King's dream alive, deserves great credit for the success of this year's celebration. But the larger work of the Commission is not yet finished. This legislation will permit the Commission to carry on its effective work for the next 3 years, and in doing so, we will enable the Commission to continue to spread Dr. King's message of justice and hope, and bring us all to a deeper understanding of his life and his remarkable contributions that made this a better land for all Americans. I urge the Senate approve this measure, so that the Commission may continue its essential work.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues, Senators D'AMATO, KENNEDY, DOLE, and HOLLINGS, in sponsoring legislation to change the termination date of the Martin Luther King, Jr. Federal Holiday Commission.

The Holiday Commission was established in August 1984 by Public Law 98-399 to assist in the first observance of the Federal legal holiday honoring Martin Luther King, Jr. Under the able leadership of Coretta Scott King, and with no appropriation from the Federal Treasury, the Commission established the theme for the holiday, planned and coordinated ceremonies and activities in keeping with the observance, and generally set the tone which made the first holiday observance a success.

To build on this success, we introduce this legislation to extend the life of the Commission from April 1986 to April 1989. With the extension, the Commission can keep up the momentum established by the first observance and pay particular attention to institutionalizing the holiday and assuring its future success through guidance and assistance to the various State holiday commissions.

As we observe Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s birth as a natonal holiday, we do more than simply honor Dr. King. We also promote the spirit of reconciliation and peacemaking that is Dr. King's legacy to us. The enactment of this bill will advance this broad concept of our new national holiday.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, today, I join in cosponsoring legislation to extend the life of the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission for 3 additional years, and to increase the number of Commissioners from 14 to 23. No Federal funds would be required, and the activities of the Commission will continue to be supported by private donations.

Few people in our history have done more to change America than Martin Luther King, Jr. His vision for America—his dream—has come to symbolize the ideals of our most heralded forefathers. At a time when the soul of this great Nation was nearly torn apart by hate and fear, the perseverance and eloquence of this one great man inspired a people and a world to search souls and right civil wrongs.

And we, in Congress, had the knowledge and wisdom to recognize and commemorate this great man and his accomplishments by establishing a holiday—the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday. It is a day set aside to reflect on the continuing struggle for a more perfect society where freedom, opportunity, and equal justice under the law are not just ideals but actualities for all.

To help our Nation celebrate this day in the appropriate spirit and manner, Congress also established the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission. The Commission was charged with the duty of coordinating efforts with Federal, State, and local governments to encourage appropriate ceremonies and activities, and to provide advice and assistance to both the public and private sectors for planning and participating the first celebration of this holiday.

For the first time in history, this country shared Martin Luther King's dream by celebrating his birthday on January 20, 1986. I had the opportunity to participate in some of the activities and ceremonies symbolic of Dr. King's dream, as did many other citizens across the Nation. The Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday was a success, and the Commission was, to a large degree, responsible for this great achievement.

Now, we must ask ourselves, "what next?" How should Americans celebrate this holiday for years to come? Will future generations associate Dr. King's birthday with long weekends and departments store sales? I would hope not. The great challenge facing this country is to ensure that our descendants honor Dr. King on his birthday by confronting their own consciences, reflecting on democratic ideals and the King legacy, and working to fulfill his dream.

The legislation before us today helps to achieve that very purpose. On April 20, the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission is scheduled to expire. By extending the life of the Commission for 3 additional years, more work can be done to bring individuals together from all races, religions, and stations in life, who can join in the spirit of togetherness as a family, a community, and a Nation on this holiday. To achieve a task so great also calls for the dedication and hard work of individuals representing a larger segment of our society, who can bring to the Commission new ideas and creative talents.

If we continue to strive toward this goal—if we are able to impart to our children the message that Dr. King brought us—then it is my belief that in days to come, all Americans will celebrate this holiday by commemorating not only the dream articulated, but the dream fulfilled.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today, with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. KENNEDY, and the distinguished majority leader, Senator DOLE, to introduce a bill to amend Public Law 98-399, which established the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission. The purpose of our bill is to enable this Commission to continue its work with respect to our annual celebration of Mr. King's birthday, to remind America and the world of those ideals for which Mr. King marched, preached, and finally died.

Since 1984, the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission, with great success, has encouraged and coordinated efforts with Americans from all walks of life in the observance of the first Federal legal holiday honoring Martin Luther King, Jr. The Commission has assisted organizations and institutions from all segments of our society, from religious and educational to business, labor, and government.

The first observance, which took place this January, was a momentous success, but it was ony the first. We must make certain that this holiday will ignite Mr. King's spirit in all of us for years to come.

Unfortunately, the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission will expire on April 20, 1986, unless we act quickly. Our bill extends the mandate of this Commission through April 20, 1989. Passage of our bill does not cost the Federal Government a single penny, but gives this Commission new life and the opportunity to continue uninterrupted in its effort, indeed, our effort, to carry the legacy of Dr. King into the future.

The celebration of Martin Luther King's birthday is not just a celebration of a man and his life, or even of black people, but of a triumph of all people, black and white, over the chains of racial conflict that have bound the American people for years. It is a time for serious reflection on a dream for national unity. It is a day in which every American is involved in the celebration of Dr. King's life, legacy, and dream.

The Commission we established in 1984 assists us in this effort. This Commission has asked for, and received the cooperation of Governors and U.S. territories to establish their own holiday commissions. I know of 37 States and 3 territories which already have done so. Hopefully, this trend will continue. With passage of our bill, it will.

We must not stop now when we have just begun to make real, lasting progress. I believe there are many Members of this Congress who believe, as I do, in "bridge building," and that just as many realize that the bridge we have been building over the chasm of racial bigotry and conflict has taken the better part of our Nation's history. We must make certain that each celebration of Dr. King's birthday is a renewing of our commitment to make his dream come true.

I urge my colleagues to join us in a commitment we all share. I urge support and passage of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 2319) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S. 2319

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. CONTINUATION OF COMMISSION.

(a) PURPOSE.—Section 3(1) of the Act of August 27, 1984 (98 Stat. 1473), is amended—

(1) by striking out "first"; and

(2) by inserting "first" before "occurs".

(b) ANNUAL REPORT.—Section 8 of the Act of August 27, 1984 (98 Stat. 1475), is amended by striking out ", 1986" and inserting in lieu thereof "of each year".

(c) TERMINATION.—Section 9 of the Act of August 27, 1984 (98 Stat. 1475), is amended by striking out "submitting its report under section 8" and inserting in lieu thereof "April 20, 1989".

SEC. 2. COMPOSITION OF COMMISSION.

Section 4(a)(6) of the Act of August 27, 1984 (98 Stat. 1473), is amended by striking out "fourteen" and inserting in lieu thereof "twenty-three".

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

CRIME BILL

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I inquire of the two distinguished leaders if my understanding is correct that there will be no problem about calling up the crime bill if there is no amendment proposed. Is that the general situation?

Mr. DOLE. It is my understanding that if there is no amendment, there is no objection to calling up the bill. I am not certain, though, that those who may have objected understand precisely what the amendment might be.

Mr. HELMS. Let me say to my two very good friends that I do not believe any Senator will oppose this highly appropriate legislation contained in my amendment. It is to eliminate a moral scourge that is building in this country, and I do not say that lightly. It is this thing called "Dial-a-Porn," whereby children can dial a number, and it is charged to their parents' telephone bill, and then they listen for a few minutes, as I understand it, to the worst sort of garbage imaginable.

This amendment is very simple, and I will share copies of it with the leaders on both sides. I hope the Senate might agree to accept this amendment on a voice vote. I think that after the amendment is examined, there will be no problem about it. I understand that Senator BRADLEY, for example, is in favor of it, as are others. I will be glad to make a copy of the amendment and other documentation available to all Senators.

I did not know that the proposal to call up this amendment was going to be made today. The information is on the way over here. I ask both leaders if they will check and see if there is any objection to that amendment.

I might say that the Commission on Pornography will reportedly recommend this amendment. This was published in the paper yesterday. So I would appreciate the cooperation of both leaders on this, if possible. Otherwise, we could talk about freestanding consideration of the legislation, or whatever. But I do want the Senate to move on this piece of legislation.

Mr. DOLE. I certainly share the views just expressed by Senator HELMS. I do not know of any opposition to the particular amendment. I think the opposition was that if we start amendments, we may trigger a string of amendments. Maybe we could deal with it in a freestanding way or this way, if there is no objection.

On TV last week, they were giving some of the horror stories because of this kind of program and how it would expose very young children to a lot of, as the Senator from North Carolina has said, garbage; that they can just dial a number and someone there is willing to provide a service.

I have not looked at the amendment, but I hope we can deal directly with that kind of conduct. To shut it off would be the way to deal with it.

Mr. HELMS. That is precisely what the amendment would do—to put an end to this.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from North Carolina for trying to bring up that amendment at this time. I will support that amendment, and I hope he will continue to persist in bringing it up.

WHERE ARE OUR ALLIES?

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, in 1962 when President Kennedy asked French President Charles De Gaulle to cooperate in the blockade of Cuba, the French leader replied with the loyalty of an ally; "If there is a war, I will be with you." He remembered that 4 million brave Americans served in World War I. He remembered that 116,708 Americans died in this defense of Europe. He remembered the dedication of 16 million Americans who served and the 407,298 who died in World War II. He had visited the American graves in Normandy. "Those Were the Days, My Friend," as the song goes.

The night before last, on the news, I watched as some European allies burned the American flag. As I painfully viewed the "Stars and Stripes" in flames, I thought about the missing F-111 and the French decision to deny overflight rights to these brave men. This only complicated the dangers of this rigorous mission, increasing the length by more than 1,200 miles. General De Gaulle would apologize for this cowardly abdication of responsibility and friendship by the French Government.

I am not proud of the conduct of the country of my ancestors in this affair. Italians as well as West Germans burned the American Flag that has twice liberated their peoples from a similar terror imposed by Adolph Hitler. Mr. Qadhafi utilizes the identical tactics and rhetoric that was used then. I feel a great sense of dismay, disappointment, and shame with this general practice of appeasement toward terrorists by our allies.

Mr. President, I looked up the word "alliance" and found as synonyms such words as "coalition," "union," "partnership," "cooperation," "affiliation." and "concern." I find these terms conspicuously absent in our alliance with France, Italy, and West Germany. I would like to thank Prime Minister Thatcher, who had carefully examined United States and British evidence against Libyan leader Qadhafi and found it conclusive, and supported the attack against Libya. She remembered. She remembered Churchill's words: "Never in the field of human conflict was so much owed by so many to so few."

After the fall of France in July of 1940, Charles De Gaulle broadcast from London to the French people the following message:

> Since those whose duty it was to hold the sword of France have let it fall, I have picked up its broken point.

Those were the days, my friends! Charles De Gaulle was a friend to the United States. He remembered. How quickly others have forgotten!

QADHAFI, TERRORISM, AND THE STINGER

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, the previous sale of Stinger missiles to Saudi Arabia contained tight security measures that were conditional to the sale. We cannot guarantee that such safety measures can or even will be taken by the rebels fighting in Angola or Afghanistan. There is no need to give these freedom fighters the best that our military has to offer without full faith and knowledge that these missiles will be stored under the same conditions outlined for Saudi Arabia. I wish to reiterate what has been stated in the past: "Not a single airplane or airport in the civilized world will be safe if these weapons fall into the wrong hands."

Today, we are assaulted by a terrible war. Not a war of conventional means, however, but a subversive, insane war. A war that has no rules, no set battleground and no clear warriors. Terrorism, Mr. President, is a cancer—springing up in isolated incidences, killing without reason, direction or justice.

Recently, the United States has been under attack by this cowardly siege. A TWA airplane, flying over the Mediterranean, had a hole ripped through it in which four innocent victims plummeted to their death. All of these victims were Americans. One was a 4-month-old child. The bomb was allegedly planted by a known international terrorist who boarded in Cairo and debarked in Athens. This terrorist is associated with the Arab Revolutionary Brigades, which is linked with the Abu Nidal group, the group responsible for the Rome and Vienna airport bombings last December.

Recently, a bomb exploded in a Berlin discotheque killing 21-year-old Army sergeant Kenneth Terrance Ford and injuring 64 other GI's. There is no one in custody, but there is strong belief that Libyan leader Qadhafi is responsible for this brutal murder.

In addition to the terrorist threat, delivering the Stinger to Savimbi in Angola will escalate regional conflict and seriously impair United States efforts to negotiate a peaceful settlement between Angola, Namibia and South Africa. This will also increase the tension between the United States Government and the Soviet Union in the South African region and globally.

Providing these Stinger missiles to Mr. Savimbi raises many questions in this Senator's mind. He has claimed to have shot down commercial/civilian airliners on four occasions. The State Department verifies that at least twice he has successfully shot down Diamond Mine Co. commercial aircraft carrying employees.

The U.S. Department of State, in its publication "Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1984," described Savimbi's UNITA by stating that "* * * with increasing frequency in 1984 UNITA's tactics have verged on terrorism." In 1983 a UNITA spokesman claimed to have shot down a plane which carried 126 civilians. Do we want UNITA to have Stingers?

We have been slow reacting to terrorism in the past. I support the President's action to strike in preemptive fashion against Libya even though it certainly is not pleasant to have to do something like this. I have been critical of President Reagan and past Presidents when they have talked tough and not acted. I am glad that in this instance specific and strong action has been taken. This was a high risk response, but I see no alternative when faced with such a radical leader as Mr. Qadhafi.

Mr. Qadhafi, has virtually stated, "We have the right to fight America, and we have the right to export terrorism to them." From my training and experience as an attorney, statements such as this connected with the evidence in the Berlin disco and TWA bombing give the United States the right to use self-defense as justification for this action. The United Nations legally recognizes this right in article 51. Democracies have a right and duty to defend their citizens.

We also need to think long and hard about preventive actions before terrorists strike. The transfer of the Stinger missiles to rebel forces in Afghanistan and Angola is irresponsible and hasty. Having these weapons available in areas where we are unable to monitor them or ensure that regulations are adhered to appears to be inviting terrorist organizations to advance to a new level of terrorism. In 1985 we had 13 significant terrorist attacks involving U.S. citizens. It is difficult enough to combat these murders without the Stingers. The Stinger missile is the wild card in Colonel Qadhafi's deck of terrorist cards. In this volatile conflict with Libya we are virtually at war over terrorism. The "mad dog" of the Middle East does not need U.S. weapons to further escalate this battle.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DENTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 minutes or a shorter period as if in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE SOVIETS' SALT ADVANTAGE

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, recently two of our colleagues, Senators QUAYLE and HOLLINGS, sent a Dear Colleague letter dated the 10th of April of this year, the subject of which was the SALT II agreement, and the decision as to whether or not we should continue to be bound or act as though we are bound by this agreement which was, of course, never ratified by the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, one of the key arguments made by those who would have us continue to adhere to the SALT II limits is that without continued adherence, the Soviets would be free to build considerably more weapons than they now have. In an important Dear Colleague letter, I think that Senators QUAYLE and HOLLINGS have brought this argument before us, and challenged it in a way that deserves our attention.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, April 10, 1986.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: Despite the Soviets' continued violation of the limits contained in the unratified, expired SALT II agreement, Congressional appeals are being made to have the President uphold these limits this May by dismantling two operational Poseidon submarines. The dismantling of these submarines clearly raises the question of whether or not continued adherence to SALT II is in our best interest even if the Soviets do choose to fully comply.

Ironically, the key argument made in favor of continuing adherence to SALT II is that without it, the Soviets would be free to build considerably more weapons than they now have. Yet, as the attached sheets demonstrate, even under SALT II limits—which apply primarily to missile launchers, not their specific payloads—the Soviets could add over 6,400 ballistic missile warheads to their arsenal within the next 6 to 7 years. At the same time, because planned U.S. strategic modernization emphasizes the deployment of missiles with fewer warheads than existing systems, SALT during the same period will require that the U.S. reduce its strategic arsenal by between 211 and 736 warheads.

Whether or not the Soviets would actually choose to make such additions, of course, is open to question given that they already have more than enough prompt warheads to destroy virtually all fixed U.S. targets of interest. Still, if we continue to adhere to SALT II, it will only codify our acceptance of a worsening and already destabilizing asymmetry. Certainly, if we are serious at all about arms control, we can do much better than build on this.

Sincerely,

DAN QUAYLE,
ERNEST F. HOLLINGS,
U.S. Senators.

U.S. POSEIDON OR MM III RV REDUCTIONS REQUIRED UNDER SALT I & II

(Next 6 to 7 years)

To compensate for the 75 ALCM bombers U.S. will deploy over 120 allowed under SALT II. (Each over 120 requires party to dismantle a MIRV'ed launcher [1]). 75 Poseidon equals −750 RV's; 75 MM III's equals −225 RV's.

Actual decrease likely to be between these 2 numbers.

U.S. RV INCREASES LIKELY UNDER SALT I & II LIMITS

(Next 6 to 7 years)

50 MX (500 RV's)—50 MM III (150 RV's) equals +350. If we deploy 50.

SICBM will have no impact on RV count since it will replace MM II's (450 of them) 1 for 1 several years into late 1990's.

(Tables reflect adjustments to correct SS–25 and SS–N–23 tabulation errors made in the original charts).

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Chair.

I yield the floor.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

VISIT TO THE SENATE BY MEMBERS OF THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I wish to notify the Senate that a very distinguished group representing the Conservative Backbench Tourism Committee of the British Parliament is visiting the Senate at this moment, for the benefit of those Senators who may be listening. I have explained to my colleagues from Great Britain that many of my Senate colleagues are in committee meetings this Thursday afternoon preparing legislation that may come to the floor this evening.

We are indeed honored to have these distinguished guests with us today. They are here on a mission to look into the tourism questions, as well as foreign relations questions, that exist between our two nations. They are guests of mine, the Senate, and the Secretary of the Senate, Jo-Anne Coe. I am proud to note that one of the Members of Parliament, Simon Coombs, is the Secretary's son-in-law. They are meeting with Members of the House and Senate and the executive branch in an effort to promote tourism between our two countries.

I believe it is particularly appropriate at this time to extend our thanks to our guests, to their Prime Minister, and their Government, for the support that Great Britain has given to the United States on the current Libyan problem.

Mr. President, I would like to say that we are pleased that the chairman of the British Conservative Backbench Tourism Committee, David Gilroy Bevan, who represents Birmingham Yardley, is here and has spoken to a luncheon earlier, which was attended by Senator DOLE, Congressman BADHAM, and many leaders of the tourism industry in the United States.

I would like to take this opportunity to introduce the other members of the committee as well. John Butterfill, a Member of Parliament, is representing Bournemouth West, the vice chairman; Conal Gregory, a Member of Parliament representing York, is the joint vice chairman; Roger Gale representing Thanet North, a Member of Parliament, is the secretary; Roger King, a Member of Parliament representing Birmingham Northfield, is the joint secretary; Richard Alexander is a Member of Parliament representing Newark; Simon Coombs is a Member of Parliament representing Swindon, who has a special relation with our Secretary; and David Lightbown is a Member of Parliament representing Staffordshire.

Mr. President, the current situation with terrorism and tourism is something that has interested all of us. As chairman of the Business, Trade, and Tourism Subcommittee of the Senate Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee, I have taken a particular interest. It has been said that the current round of terrorism may well result in less Americans traveling to Europe. I do not know if that is true, but I do think that we should all work together to end terrorism, and to carefully analyze our current situation because the shoe could be on the other foot in the future.

I think it is very appropriate that we are listening to our friends and colleagues, recognizing that problems with safe travel have not existed for the most part in Great Britain and, indeed, as I am quick to point out, that Great Britain has been the only country that has stood with us in our current difficult situation with Libya.

Mr. President, I am very proud to present these Members to the U.S. Senate.

[1] 99 ALCM bombers now deployed; 195 will be deployed by 1992.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have had some inquiries from both sides on what we may do the remainder of the day.

One matter we thought we had before the Senate at this moment, the Bankruptcy Court Judges Act, has been delayed because of some area of dispute that we hope can be worked out and the bill taken up later.

I do believe that we will be able to complete action this afternoon on S. 1236, technical amendments to the crime bill. It is a matter that has been worked out on both sides. I have been advised that it took about 30 days to do that, so we hope we can dispose of that matter at 4 o'clock.

The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) wants to propose an amendment to that bill, and it is now in the process of being circulated. It is called the antidial-a-porn amendment. In effect, it would prohibit that service being offered particularly to young people, who apparently dial a number and get a lot of garbage on the telephone. If that amendment can be offered to S. 1236, it is my hope that the Senator from North Carolina will let us proceed to the bill and perhaps bring up his proposal now or at a later time as a freestanding measure.

It is also my hope that this afternoon we can lay before the Senate a message from the House on S. 49, the gun control bill. I see no reason why we cannot dispose of that this afternoon. It is a major piece of legislation that passed the House with an overwhelming majority. It is my intention to do that.

I am also contemplating the drug export bill. There may be some difficulty in proceeding to that bill. I hope not. It came out of the committee, I think, with only two dissenting votes, one of those being a proxy. It is a matter of some importance, and I hope we can complete action on that bill this afternoon, though I doubt that is going to happen. If not, it is possible that we will move to proceed to the drug export bill within a day or so, file a cloture motion and have a cloture vote next week.

On Monday, also, we believe we can get a time agreement on the nomination of Donald M. Newman to be Under Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services. There is some opposition to the nomination, but I hope we can work out a time agreement which may result in a vote, perhaps not a rollcall, on Monday.

So we have a number of items we can probably take care of today.

I alert my colleagues that if we do complete action on S. 1236 very quickly after 4—I urge those who are responsible for that proposal to be here at 4; we should have done this at 1, and it is now 10 after 3—then we would ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the House on S. 49, the gun control bill, unless there is some reason not to do that. I hope we can dispose of that this afternoon and anything else that Members on either side would like to bring before the Senate.

There will be no rollcall votes tomorrow. It is possible that there will not be a session tomorrow, but I will be able to announce that later.

As to Monday, I am not yet prepared to indicate whether or not there will be rollcall votes; but, in any event, there will be no rollcall votes after 6 o'clock on Monday.

RECESS UNTIL 4 P.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have consulted indirectly with the distinguished minority leader, Senator BYRD. Since there are a number of conferences going on and since some of the Members who have these various bills will not be available until 4 o'clock, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 4 p.m.

The motion was agreed to, and at 3:12 p.m., the Senate recessed until 4 p.m.

Whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer (Mr. EVANS).

Mr. EXON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MARINE SECURITY GUARD LETTER ON TERRORISM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, this morning, I announced I would join Senator DENTON in introducing a bill clarifying the President's authority and strengthening his hand in dealing with international terrorism, and I have already inserted that statement in the RECORD.

Quite by coincidence, when I returned to my office from the floor, I found on top of my mail a letter written to me by one of the U.S. marine security guards at our Embassy in Luxembourg.

The young man who wrote me, Sgt. Paul Duquette, a native of Lowell, MA, has a very personal connection to the terrorism problem. He was on duty at our Embassy in Beirut the first time it was attacked. He's also served in Damascus, Syria. And, of course, he remains very much on the firing line in his current duty station in Europe, protecting our personnel and facilities. This gives Sergeant Duquette credentials that almost none of the rest of us can match to comment on this issue.

Let me just quote one part of his letter:

> Like all marines I take pride in my duty serving my country but it isn't getting any easier. I feel that Congress hasn't been moving quickly enough on this problem area. Please let me know if I'm right or wrong. Please get Congress moving in the right direction.

Mr. President, Sergeant Duquette has the right—he has earned that right in Beirut and elsewhere—to make this request. In moving quickly and affirmatively to enact the bill I introduce today, we can help fulfill our responsibility to Sergeant Duquette, and to all his military and civilian colleagues, serving our country faithfully and courageously around the world.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of Sergeant Duquette's letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EMBASSY OF THE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Luxembourg, April 11, 1986.

S. Sgt. PAUL A. DUQUETTE, USMC,
American Embassy, Luxembourg,
APO New York, NY 09132

To Hon. ROBERT J. DOLE:

DEAR SENATOR DOLE: I am writing you this letter in regard to the overwhelming number of terrorist attacks against our nation and its people, at home and abroad. In the last twelve months alone terrorist attacks against our beautiful country and its citizens have caused a lot (to many) of deaths and hardships for our country and it doesn't seem to be getting any better. I am in the military and serve in the world's finest fighting force, "The Marines". Although I am from Lowell, MA, I am writing you because you are the Majority Leader of the Senate, and one of the jobs of any leader is to influence his men to do the right thing and work together as a team. I have been in the Marines for five years now and have spent most of my time serving my country overseas. I was a victim of a terrorist attack, at which our Embassy in Beirut was blown up (first time). Needless to say we are all victims when something like this happens.

My last two duty assignments were in Beirut, Lebanon and Damascus, Syria guarding our Embassies against these barbaric acts. I am currently serving in Luxembourg now and like all Marines I take pride in my duty "serving my country" but it isn't getting any easier. To tell you the truth, just open a newspaper or turn on the radio.

The time is now to concentrate all our efforts to combat this problem (threat). I applaud the President (and so should everyone else) for putting the 6th fleet into action against a commonly known terrorist. But, I feel that Congress hasn't been moving quickly enough on this problem area, please let me know if I'm right or wrong. Please get Congress moving in the right direction.

In closing, I hope to hear from you in the near future informing me on what Congress is doing to assist in fighting terrorism. I would also like to take this time and personally "thank you" for the support you have given the military. All of us in the military especially the Marines appreciate it, and hope you continue to support us in every way possible.

Thank you for your time, a Marine "on duty."

S. Sgt. PAUL A. DUQUETTE, USMC,
American Embassy, Luxembourg.

SCHEDULE

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I wonder if the majority leader will yield?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield the floor.

Mr. CHILES. I was going to ask him if he could tell us something about our schedule tomorrow. I am hoping we will get a chance to maybe take up the budget tomorrow or lay it down and start on that.

Mr. DOLE. There is a remote possibility, I say to my friend from Florida.

We had a meeting scheduled at noon tomorrow with the Speaker, myself, Congressman MICHEL, Senator DOMENICI, Senator HATFIELD, and Congressman LOTT. But I understand that Congressman MICHEL may not be available tomorrow.

I would hope to have had that meeting before making a final judgment, seeing if the House would cooperate, I guess may be the right words, so we could both commence work on the budget. They have not, as the Senator knows, marked up their bill yet.

But I would assume if the budget is laid down tomorrow it would be debate only. I would not think you would want to get into the amendment process. I have already indicated there would be no votes on tomorrow. But I am not trying to be evasive. I am just not certain whether it will happen tomorrow but it is going to happen quite soon.

I know the Senator from Florida really wants to get at it. So does my good friend from New Mexico, Senator DOMENICI, and, of course, as the chairman and ranking Democrat on the Budget Committee, he has a lot of time invested, a lot of work, and I am not trying to frustrate those good intentions.

Mr. CHILES. We understand that maybe if it is not total unanimity in the product that we produced so far that it may take us a little time on the floor. So, obviously, if we could lay it down tomorrow, even if there could not be any votes on amendments or anything, we would be starting the process and then I think Members would well know that that would be something that we would be dealing with next week.

Mr. DOLE. Right, and it would be my intention once we are on it we are on it, unless something happened and we got bogged down. I am not the expert on rules, as is my colleague, the Senator from West Virginia, Senator BYRD, but I understand the only way to get off would be either to recommit the budget or to move to some other privileged matter. As soon as we finish that we would be back on the budget, so I am trying to—I do not disagree with the Senator from Florida. I guess that is my point.

Mr. CHILES. Does the Senator know when we might have some reading as to whether we could start on it tomorrow or not?

Mr. DOLE. I guess it is fair to say I have a meeting at 4:30 p.m. with the Office of Management and Budget Director, Mr. Miller, and a bit later than that, with Mr. Miller, Mr. DOMENICI, and Mr. GRAMM. There seems to be a split on our side. It may not have been observed yet by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. I have not observed it.

Mr. DOLE. But I think there is a split here. There are about 25 one way and 25 the other way and three are undecided. So we are working on it.

Mr. CHILES. Then would the majority leader think that maybe after those meetings we might have some word as to whether we could lay it down tomorrow?

Mr. DOLE. That is correct.

Mr. CHILES. I urge again the majority leader to try to get started on it tomorrow. I think it is very important that we lay it down.

MATERIALS PROCESSING IN SPACE—THE PROMISE AND THE CHALLENGE

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, routine access to space creates great opportunity for the development and manufacture of materials of types and purities heretofore unavailable. Advanced high speed computers, lifesaving drugs, environment cleaning catalysts, new metals and glasses, and much more, are literally just beyond the horizon. This, largely, is made possible through the almost total escape from the Earth's gravitational forces into what is known as a microgravity environment. Here, warm air does not rise and liquids freeze uniformly instead of first from the surface. A constant and nearly perfect vacuum is readily available.

The potential of manufacturing materials in space is immense. Just as the rockets and spacecraft of the 1960's led to the multibillion-dollar telecommunications industry of today, manned space laboratories promise to engender an equally rewarding revolution in materials processing. The development of new materials in space will lead to an era of technological leadership for the Nation which opens this frontier. In fact, international competition has already begun. The United States, Japan, European nations and the Soviet Union have begun vigorous pursuit of these rewards. The challenge is there and we must meet it.

In pursuing this challenge there are several factors which must be examined including potential products, elements of the competition and the need.

POTENTIAL PRODUCTS

A. SEMICONDUCTORS

Semiconductor materials have been at the very heart of the many products which have driven the current technological revolution. They are used for computing and data processing applications, for telecommunications, for sensor materials for military and medical usage, and for a wide variety of other electronic applications. In fact, millions of new careers have resulted from our ability to produce better and better semiconductor materials for communications and data processing components. And many now believe that we are approaching a second revolution in information processing through the utilization of light rather than electrons to communicate and store data.

The ability of semiconductors to process and store this information is dependent on the quality of the crystals from which the semiconductors are made. Large, uniform crystals free of contaminates provide the best materials for electronic and optical use.

Although materials scientists have succeeded in producing very high quality silicon for current applications, the gravitational effect known as thermal convection has limited their ability to produce more advanced materials capable of faster switching over a wider temperature range and which allow optical rather than electronic processing. The microgravity environment of space with its absence of thermal convection is expected to effectively eliminate previous uncontrolled variations in crystals made from such advanced semiconductor materials as gallium arsenide, indium antimony and mercury caldium telluride. In turn, these tremendous improvements in crystal quality should lead to revolutionary new applications in advanced computers, optical microcircuits and in sensors capable of responding to a very broad spectrum of light, ranging from microwaves and heat to x-rays and gamma rays.

B. PHARMACEUTICALS

Pharmaceuticals already are being developed commercially in space. In the last decade, biomedical researchers have uncovered a myriad of hormones, enzymes, and other substances which have had beneficial effects on people.

Because of sedimentation and buoyancy, both effects of Earth's gravity, many of these potentially lifesaving chemicals cannot be purified or produced in quantities allowing their routine use in the treatment of common illnesses. Other pharmaceuticals are totally impossible to formulate on Earth. However, all can become available in the microgravity of space laboratories.

Among the medical problems for which space-produced pharmaceuticals hold promise are cancer, diabetes, anemia, dwarfism, and hemophilia. Additionally, current research indicates the possibility of producing drugs which may reduce the need for blood transfusions during surgery.

C. NEW GLASSES

Escape from Earth's gravity also eliminates the need to process materials within a container. This freedom allows production of glasses that cannot be duplicated on Earth where materials first freeze at the points of contact with the walls of the vessels in which they are contained. Also, most glasses are cooled from a very molten state which readily dissolves the materials from which glass crucibles are made. This introduces impurities which compromise the clarity and uniformity of the glass produced.

Containerless processing in microgravity laboratories will allow purer, more uniform glasses of new materials. This should lead to new applications for optical fiber materials which need fewer repeated stations. These could be used, for example, for new laser host materials.

D. NEW METAL ALLOYS.

Microgravity processing of metals will enable metallurgists to develop new alloys and establish reference standards against which to apply Earth-based research and development. This may lead to new forms of lightweight structures for aircraft and rockets, to new high strength cast iron and steel, to new superconducting magnetic alloys and, indeed, to new understanding of fundamental metal properties.

Manufacturers of such traditional products as automobiles and farm implements already are conducting space-based research into new alloys

E. AND MORE

Additional products for which new applications are being investigated include uniform calibration standards, molecular sieves and new nylon-like polymers. The first commercial cell of a space-based material was of monodisperse latex spheres which are used as a calibration standard for filters.

Molecular sieves produced under microgravity conditions promise to open new applications of gas separations, membranes for medical uses and purification of environmental pollutants and radioactive waste. Ultra high strength nylon fibers produced in microgravity are now being investigated by American industry.

THE COMPETITORS

Materials processing in space is being vigorously pursued by many nations. The nation which opens this new frontier will be the leader of a new technological era. Those nations already active in this area are:

A. UNITED STATES

The United States performed a few simple experiments during the Skylab Program in 1973–74 and in the Apollo-Soyuz Text Program in 1975. This was followed by a long period of relative inactivity restricted to tests on a few very brief sounding rocket flights.

For the United States, the development of materials processing in space did not reach an appreciable level of activity until the introduction of the space shuttle in 1981. Since then, microgravity processing experiments have been carried aboard shuttle orbitors in almost every flight.

Several dozen American companies now have taken steps to secure a role in microgravity materials processing. Those which have invested their own resources to develop commercial opportunities in space range from some of the Nation's largest corporations to small entrepreneurs. They include industries involved in chemicals, metals, communications, aerospace and automotive products, farm machinery, and pharmaceuticals. Within the last year, a total of 24 companies and 12 universities have established 4 consortia to perform joint research in microgravity processing.

B. SOVIET UNION

The Russians flew their first microgravity processing experiment in 1975 during the Apollo-Soyuz Test Program. They then embarked on a long-range experimental development program aboard the SALYUT manned space stations, and have had materials processing equipment in space continuously since 1978.

In contrast to the American program of sporadic, independent experiments, the Soviets have demonstrated a remarkable capacity for performing extended, directed research. It has been estimated that the Russians, in total, have performed more than 1,600 materials processing experiments in the SALYUT space stations with international cosmonaut crews which have included East Germans, Poles, Hungarians, Cubans, Czechs, and Vietnamese.

Most of the Soviet Union's attention appears to have been directed at three semiconductor materials; gallium arsenide, indium antimonide and mercury cadmium telluride. Semiconductors using these materials are extremely valuable for military systems. They can be used for high speed computing and the development of radiation resistant signal processors and infrared sensors used for military applications. Any advantage that the Soviets gain in the ability to produce semiconductors of these high quality materials would readily translate to a strategic advantage in developing high speed, radiation resistant, high quality radars, sensors and missile guidance and navigation systems. The Soviets claim to have already manufactured and used for medical purposes infrared sensor devices which were made with mercury cadmium teluride produced aboard SALYUT.

In 1983 the Russians incorporated into the SALYUT system an unmanned re-entry module which can return up to 500 kilograms (1,100 pounds) of materials to Earth between crew visits to the station. Earlier this year, the Soviets stated that they will assemble and orbit large production complexes with semiconductor-materials production facilities, research laboratories and hothouses.

C. EUROPE AND JAPAN

The Europeans and Japanese are expected to fly repeated missions aboard the space shuttle. The Europeans have already carried out a number of materials processing experiments in the space shuttle's spacelab, operated by American and European scientists. West Germany flew a spacelab mission in 1985 which focused on microgravity processing. The crew included two scientists from West Germany and one from Holland.

Recently, West German companies have established a new consortium, named IntoSpace, chartered to market its space processing opportunities to European industry, particularly those currently not involved in aerospace activities. The Japanese are scheduled to fly a spacelab mission in 1988, focusing their attention on microgravity processing.

There seems little doubt as to the seriousness with which our allies—and others—intend to compete in this new commercial arena made possible by routine access to space.

THE NEED

Materials processing work will continue aboard the space shuttle once shuttle flights are restored. However, the shuttle will be flying only about once a month, and even then, it is in orbit for only about a week at a time. This is hardly long enough to perform the needed detailed development program. The key need is the permanently orbiting, manned space station now planned by NASA.

The space station will contain a laboratory for microgravity processing with the capability to perform the whole range of materials development necessary, from basic research through process development, technology advancement, commercial process prototyping, and commercial production of materials. Once in orbit in the 1990's, the space station will provide American science and industry the opportunity to gain and maintain a position of technological leadership in the applications of advanced materials into the 21st century. This leadership will be manifested in new forms of life-saving drugs, in advanced computers, fluid processes, and in a new understanding of metals and glasses. It will lead to prosperity and to military strength and security.

Mr. President, just as the development of orbital satellites has led to new jobs and economic growth in the telecommunications industry and as improved processing of silicon materials has led to great gains in the computer industry, advanced materials processing in space will bring about economic growth, security and improved medical care to our generation and those to follow.

Thank you, Mr. President.

AUBURN SESQUICENTENNIAL ANNIVERSARY

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to rise today to congratulate the citizens of Auburn, AL on their sesquicentennial anniversary. On the weekend of April 25, 1986, they will join together to celebrate their 150th anniversary with parades, dances, athletic events, and community gatherings. I am certain that it will be a weekend to remember.

Although the city was founded in 1836, settlers from Georgia actually colonized the town site between 1833 and 1835. They came with their families to build homes after having heard favorable accounts about the area from a Reverend Morgan Terertine, who was a missionary to the Indians. Indeed, that part of Alabama was still Indian country, and after a long journey on the night of their arrival, these brave new Alabamians were attacked by Indians who still inhabited the area. However, the settlers were stubborn in the face of adversity. With true Alabama spirit, great resolve, and determination, they worked together to transform this harsh wilderness into a flourishing town, a civilized community.

In 1836 it seems that the town leaders faced a dilemma of a different sort from the Indian attacks and the ravages of the frontier. In just a short period of time their town had prospered to the point that the settlers decided to find a name with which to grace this special place where they had made their homes. Yet, a consensus could not be reached—the perfect name could not be found. Finally, Tom Harper, the son of town father Judge Harper, returned to Georgia for supplies. There, his future bride, Miss Lizzie Taylor, a schoolgirl, had been reading Goldsmith's "Deserted Village." When she heard that the town needed a name, she promptly exclaimed, "Name it Auburn, Sweet Auburn, loveliest village of the plain!" It was, and has been, indeed, the perfect name for this wonderful city. It embodies the beautiful countryside, the handsome surroundings, the graceful homes and hospitality of its people that adorn the town.

Since its origins, the city of Auburn has always been closely linked with education. The town leaders had placed great emphasis on religion, education, and culture when settling their new town. The first school was built in 1838, and Simeon Yancey was recruited as the first instructor. In 1856, Auburn had two fine schools, William F. Slaton's Male Academy, and the Auburn Masonic Female College. By this time, Auburn was a bustling town, a cultural and social center for eastern Alabama and western Georgia as well as a commercial center. It was said that, "The social life of Auburn in those days was as fine as could be found in the whole land." One of three railroads in operation in Alabama passed through it, and there were numerous business and cultural advantages. The citizens took an active part in the arts and in political debates. It was the ideal environment for an institute of higher learning. After great efforts, Auburn town leaders were finally successful in their attempt to attract a college for their sons. On February 1, 1856, the legislature of Alabama passed an act incorporating the East Alabama Male College. Thus, the town of Auburn was inextricably linked with higher education. Without the founding of this small school Auburn University would not exist today, for in February 1872, this small college became the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Alabama, the precursor of Auburn University, the school we now treasure.

One cannot examine the accomplishments of the citizens of Auburn without also considering the contributions of Auburn University. Through the years, each has benefited the other in their great work together. The interests of town and college have been mutual. These joint efforts have benefited the State of Alabama and the people of this Nation as well as those in the city and the institution. The shared triumphs of the city and the university are of a greater magnitude than any singular advances could hope to be. Thus, greater goals are accomplished in this unique spirit of the Auburn community where citizens and school officials work together. Past achievements are indicative of the great aid that Auburn University has already provided to mankind. Advances in agriculture have helped farmers to increase crop yields. Veterinary research has helped both commercial livestock owners and small children who own pets. Furthermore, research into space power and laser technology helps to prepare America for the future. The strong commitment that Auburn town leaders made to education in 1838 has certainly paid off. These great accomplishments in education and technology have resulted in an improvement in the condition of life for countless Alabamians and Americans. I must stress that these gains would not be possible without the joint interaction and shared effort that exists in Auburn between the city and the university. Without the unique spirit of this great community we would all be at a loss.

For 150 years, Auburn has been devoted to the enrichment, and fulfillment of human life and society by encouraging culture, education, and religous worship. This sesquicentennial anniversary it not merely a birthday celebration. Rather, it offers the citizens of Auburn an opportunity to look into their past and to realize all that they have accomplished. Those successes and rewards which are reaching fruition today were actually initiated by the many great citizens who labored in the past to make Auburn a better place. Now is the time to remember those whose efforts have culminated in all that Auburn has to offer.

Now, also, is the time to think of the future. The ch,ldren of today will be planning for Auburn's bicentennial in just 50 short years. The dreams of today will grow, take shape and mature in time to benefit them. In the years to come, I am certain that Auburn will make even greater advances—that it will offer even more to its citizens, its State, and its country. I am delighted to congratulate Auburn on its sesquicentennial. I am very proud to represent the citizens of Auburn and am pleased to serve them in every way I can. Thank you Mr. President.

THE CRIME BILL

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I wonder if I could inquire of the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee about what the plans are with respect to the crime bill.

Mr. DOLE. It would be my hope, if the Senator would yield, that we could take up S. 1236 and again I will indicate that it is a matter that I am not fully versed on, but I understand the committee has worked for about, they were telling me earlier, 30 days on a lot of very technical amendments—they are not major amendments, but they are technical amendments—to the major crime package we passed here about a year or two ago. The Justice Department is very anxious to have these amendments. They think they are necessary.

I happen to agree with the Senator from North Carolina that there is a good amendment floating around; it is called anti-Dial-a-Porn, and I support the Senator in that.

I have just discussed this matter with the chairman of the Constitution Subcommittee who also indicates his support. It is our hope that we can satisfy the Senator from North Carolina so it will not be necessary for him to offer the amendment to this bill.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HELMS. I yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, we are ready to go forward with these amendments to the omnibus crime bill, entitled Minor and Technical Amendments to the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984. These are very important amendments. We have been working on them now for several months. The Justice Department is insisting we rush them, if at all possible, because it could affect some cases they are trying.

The able Senator from North Carolina spoke to us about a pornography amendment, which I favor and have no objection to it being added to this bill. But the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM,] indicated he will oppose it. The able Senator from North Carolina has talked with him and I have talked with him and he has told me, in the last 20 minutes, that he is opposed to these amendments and that he will filibuster them, if necessary. And he says there are others who will filibuster them.

In view of that, I hope that the distinguished Senator from North Carolina would not insist on offering them at this time. He has a bill in the Judiciary Committee now on which a hearing has been held in the Criminal Law Subcommittee. It is back to the full committee and it is ready to go on the agenda. I can assure him it will go on the agenda and will be reached as soon as we can get to it.

In view of that, I hope that he would be kind enough not to offer the amendment at this time.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from South Carolina. I assure him and the distinguished majority leader that it is not my intent to hold up the passage of the pending bill or the bill which will shortly be pending.

I am just mystified that any Senator would oppose doing away with the scourge in this country called Dial-a-Porn. I may be naive—I have been around this place about 14 years now—but this is one amendment which I felt that all Senators would welcome, because it will be recommended by the Commission on Pornography. It is sorely needed to put an end to children all over America using the long distance telephone service of their parents to dial a number—a 1-900 number; I understand many of the machines are in New York—for a fee. And, bear in mind, Mr. President, that the people—the entrepreneurs, if you want to call them that; that is too nice a word for me to use for them—but the people who are doing this dirty business are making millions out of it at 50 cents a clip off of parents whose telephone bills are charged with calls to New York City and elsewhere to listen to, as I understand it, 4 to 5 minutes of garbage, sewer talk.

I am perfectly willing not to offer the amendment to this legislation provided I can have some assurance from the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the distinguished majority leader. As I understand it, I say to Senator THURMOND, he has said that, inasmuch as the bill has been the subject of a hearing by the Subcommittee of the Judiciary, the Criminal Law Subcommittee, it is now subject to be put on the agenda.

Mr. THURMOND. It is ready to be put on the agenda of the full committee, and it will be placed on that agenda and we will reach it in due time.

Mr. HELMS. Well, of course, nobody knows what "due time" is around this place, if you have a Senator who is going to filibuster, because it is possible to filibuster in committee, as well as on the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. If there are filibusters in the committee, I will get back in touch with the Senator. And if there is a filibuster and there is no way to get it out, then the Senator can place it on the calendar over here.

Mr. HELMS. I think I am going to do that, in any case.

I would ask the distinguished majority leader, If Senator THURMOND encounters a filibuster in his committee reporting the bill which would abolish "Dial-a-Porn," could I have the assurance of the majority leader that he would endeavor to call up the bill from the calendar?

Mr. DOLE. Yes; I can give the distinguished Senator that assurance. I do not understand why anybody would object to it, unless it be some big corporation that may be profiting from the telephone calls. I cannot believe anybody else would have any problem with a bill of that kind.

Mr. HELMS. With that assurance, I say to my friends, the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I will withhold offering the amendment which, as I said earlier, I had anticipated that the entire Senate would be willing to approve forthwith on a voice vote. Because, if anything is clear in this world, it is that we have to stop stuff like this.

I thank the distinguished majority leader and I thank the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, first let me thank the distinguished Senator from North Carolina and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator THURMOND from South Carolina. It would be my hope that there would not be an effort to tie this bill up in the committee. But, if so, as I have indicated, we will try to work it out some other way.

I think additional hearings before the Subcommittee on the Constitution in the Judiciary Committee would be very helpful and if there are any problems they could be resolved.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, hearings have already been held in the Criminal Law Subcommittee and it is now ready to be put on the agenda of the full committee. If the distinguished Senator from North Carolina wants to go to another subcommittee for another hearing, I have no objection, but that would just take more time.

Mr. HELMS. That is correct. I do not believe further hearings are needed.

Mr. DOLE. Yes, that would take more time.

Mr. President, I understand the distinguished minority leader would like to be present. We are ready to proceed.

REPORT TO THE SENATE CONCERNING THE STRIKE IN LIBYA

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, while we are waiting for the distinguished minority leader, I would like to include in the RECORD at this point a letter addressed to the distinguished President pro tempore, Senator THURMOND, from the President, dated April 16, 1986. This letter is a report to the Senate concerning the strike in Libya.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I already put that in last night.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am advised by the distinguished President pro tempore it has been included in the RECORD, so I will not ask it be included again.

But I would state that the President has indicated in this letter, which is in the RECORD, that it does meet the requirements and is a precise summary of the events to date in Libya.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 4:45 p.m. with statements limited to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DIAL-A-PORN AMENDMENT

Mr. HELMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, while we have a few moments, if the distinguished minority leader will bear with me, let me discuss very briefly the amendment that I would have proposed to the crime bill. We call it the Dial-a-Porn amendment, and the purpose of it is to eliminate completely the "Dial-a-Porn" operations by repealing a few words in section 223(b) of the Communications Act of 1934. The amendment adds no substantive language of any kind to current law. It—purely and simply—removes a gaping loophole in existing law.

Mr. President, American parents have enough to contend with in 1986 without having to worry about whether their children will be able to pick up the phone, dial a number, and then hear an obscene recorded message. Yet since Congress first addressed the problem of dial-a-porn in December 1983, the dial-a-porn industry has flourished, and our children in particular and American society in general have been the losers.

The loophole in existing law is that it affirmatively authorizes dial-a-porn for consenting adults. Thus, dial-a-porn operators are given a green light to go into business, and then the practical problem arises—and it arises in thousands of cases every day—as to how to keep children from calling the dial-a-porn numbers. That practical problem, Mr. President, has proven to be totally insoluble. Moreover, there is no good reason for Congress to authorize our interstate telephone system to be used for the communication of pornographic messages—even to adults, for that matter. These are recorded messages. These are not conversations. These are recorded filth.

Mr. President, the prohibitions currently in place under section 223(b) of the Communications Act of 1934 are sufficient to shut down the dial-a-porn industry, if we simply eliminate the loophole. The loophole has two parts.

The first part of the loophole is that portion of section 223(b)(1)(A) which makes dial-a-porn criminal only if it goes to a person under 18 years of age or to a person who has not consented to receiving the message. My amendment eliminates this crippling qualification to the prohibition against dial-a-porn. Thus, the prohibition against dial-a-porn would apply to everyone—not just minors and nonconsenting adults, as is currently the case.

The second part of the loophole is all of section 223(b)(2) which provides: "It is a defense to a prosecution under this section that the defendant restricted access to the prohibited communication to persons 18 years of age or older in accordance with procedures which the Commission (the FCC) shall prescribe by regulation." My amendment—which I would have offered to this legislation I contend is the most appropriate vehicle for this—would remove this complete, affirmative defense to prosecution under section 223(b), and it would make the current penalties for dial-a-porn under section 223(b) meaningful for the first time.

Mr. President, I have heard from parents all over this country about this matter. Many constituents have contacted me time and time again on this problem of dial-a-porn. Most recently, I received a letter from the father of a 9-year-old boy. This is typical of what I am hearing. The father sent me a copy of his telephone bill and underlined three long distance calls to a "900" number. "While questioning my son about these calls," the father wrote, "I discovered that the long distance calls were placed to a service which provides sexually explicit messages. Apparently, some older children told my son that this number was the number of 'Teddy Ruxpin,' the talking teddy bear. The joke was not very funny when one considers the fact that the morals of young children are being corrupted in the process."

Mr. President, the need for this legislation, I believe, is completely evident in this father's letter. We, in Congress, owe the parents of America better than what they now have to contend with on this matter of dial-a-porn.

I urge that we move as quickly as possible and Senator THURMOND and Senator DOLE have assured me that they will cooperate fully. Therefore, I do not intend to offer the amendment.

I yield the floor. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. THURMOND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

COMPREHENSIVE CRIME CONTROL ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. THURMOND. I would like to inquire of the distinguished Democratic leader if he has cleared Calendar 596, S. 1236, minor and technical amendments to the crime bill.

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. THURMOND. Senator BIDEN had a statement in favor of it, and Senator METZENBAUM does not oppose it. I have heard of no opposition on the part of anyone.

Mr. BYRD. It is my understanding that there will only be two amendments offered to the measure, and those two amendments will be offered by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, that is correct.

Mr. BYRD. There is no objection on this side.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now turn to Calendar 596, S. 1236, minor and technical amendments to the crime bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill, (S. 1236), to amend title 18 of the United States Code and other laws to make minor or technical amendments to provisions enacted by the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1236) to amend title 18 of the United States Code and other laws to make minor or technical amendments to provisions enacted by the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I rise in support of S. 1236—a bill that would make minor and technical corrections to the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984.

As most of you are aware, the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984 embodied the most significant series of changes in the Federal criminal justice system ever enacted at one time. I was pleased to have been able to lead the effort, along with several of my distinguished colleagues, in securing passage of that legislation in the 98th Congress. The act was passed during the final weeks of the 98th Congress under demanding time constraints, and inevitably some ambiguities and technical defects found their way into the legislation.

On June 4, 1985, I introduced S. 1236, along with my colleagues Senator BIDEN, ranking minority member of the Judiciary Committee, Senator LAXALT, and Senator KENNEDY to correct those defects. This bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which I am chairman. S. 1236, as originally introduced, included 85 provisions covering all areas of the Federal criminal law. To expedite consideration of this legislation, the committee formulated a compromise containing those sections of S. 1236 which the members of the Judiciary Committee unanimously supported and it was offered as an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The committee unanimously approved this substitute at its executive committee meeting on December 12, 1985, and it was reported on April 4, 1986 (S. Rep. 99-278).

AMENDMENT NO. 1794

(Purpose: To clarify certain fine and sentencing guideline provisions)

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I now send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself, Senator BIDEN, Senator LAXALT, Senator KENNEDY, Senator HATCH, Senator GRASSLEY, Senator SPECTER, and Senator EAST, to the committee substitute, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], for himself, and Mr. BIDEN, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. HATCH, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. SPECTER, and Mr. EAST, proposes an amendment numbered 1794.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 61, strike out lines 22 through 3 on page 62 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(1) in subsection (a)(2) by—

(A) redesignating subparagraphs (D) and (E) as subparagraphs (E) and (F), respectively;

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today I am offering an amendment to S. 1236 to make several changes in the sentencing provisions of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984.

I am pleased to be joined in offering this legislation by several of my distinguished colleagues on the Judiciary Committee—Senator BIDEN of Delaware, ranking minority member, as well as Senators LAXALT, KENNEDY, HATCH, GRASSLEY, SPECTER, and EAST.

This amendment would make changes with regard to the duties of the U.S. Sentencing Commission and the appellate review of sentences imposed by district courts.

First, the Commission's authority would be expanded to authorize it to promulgate policy statements regarding the imposition of fines in accordance with the applicable provision of Title 18 of the United States Code. This change would be consistent with the Commission's present authority to issue policy statements with regard to matters such as the application of sentencing guidelines, the sanctions of forfeiture, and plea agreements. In addition, this change would enhance the usefulness of the Commission's work to the Federal judicial system.

Second, the amendment modifies the requirement for sentencing guidelines that provides for ranges in the term of imprisonment. Currently, the maximum of the range may not exceed the minimum of that range by more than 25 percent. S. 1236, as reported by the committee, provides that when the maximum of the range is life imprisonment, the minimum of that range would be 30 years. This amendment would change that number to 25 years and would also provide that when the maximum term of the range is 1 year or less, the maximum shall not exceed the minimum of that range by more than 50 percent, or 60 days, whichever is greater. When the maximum term of the range is 1 year or less, a 25-percent variance would not allow the Commission sufficient flexibility to develop meaningful guidelines for relatively minor crimes. In this instance, the difference in the range would only amount to a small number of days which could possibly encourage defendants to stand trial rather than plead guilty. This change would enable the commission to draft meaningful, realistic guidelines with regard to the lower end of the imprisonment sentencing scale.

The amendment would also amend certain provisions pertaining to the appellate review of sentences. Currently, an appellate court may overturn a sentence if it determines that the sentence was imposed as a result of an "incorrect application" of the sentencing guidelines. This amendment would change the standard of review to require the court to determine that the sentence was the result of a "clearly erroneous construction" of the sentencing guidelines. This modified standard, unlike the current standard, is well defined in current law, more familiar to potential appellate litigants, and gives more appropriate weight to the sentencing decisions of Federal district court judges.

Finally, this amendment would modify the current law which permits the appellate court to resentence a defendant. The responsibility for sentencing and resentencing has traditionally been reserved for the district court in that the presence of the defendant gives the sentencing judge the opportunity to observe the demeanor and attitude of the defendant. As well, the presence of the victim, prosecutor, and defense attorney, and any other relevant witnesses gives the district court insight into the sentencing process that an appellate judge could not realize from a record alone. This bill would, therefore, require an appellate court that finds in favor of the defendant, to remand the case with appropriate instruction to the district court for further sentencing procedures.

Judge William W. Wilkins, Jr., Chairman of the U.S. Sentencing

Commission, has indicated that these changes are necessary in order to ensure the meaningful development and implementation of the sentencing guidelines which the Commission will submit to Congress by April 13, 1987, and the Department of Justice concurs. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation. This legislation needs to be enacted as soon as possible because some of the provisions relate directly to the drafting of the sentencing guidelines. I strongly urge my colleagues to accept this amendment by unanimous consent.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, as an original cosponsor of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act that was passed in 1984, I join with Senators THURMOND, KENNEDY, and LAXALT in moving these technical corrections and minor amendments. I introduced these changes in the same bipartisan spirit that carried through our efforts last Congress to pass the most encompassing changes to our Federal Criminal Code in decades.

In the wee hours of the morning when the comprehensive crime control bill passed the Senate, all of us most actively involved recognized that minor and technical amendments would be needed in the future. As my colleagues may recall, the components of the comprehensive crime bill were expanded by 11 titles and in the limited time available before the end of the 98th Congress, drafting and conforming changes in the legislation were extremely difficult.

As with past legislation I have introduced by request with the chairman, it was recognized that careful review and scrutiny of these changes would need to be done in committee.

In considering this bill in committee, the approach taken was reflective of how we all worked together on passing the original crime bill. In that spirit, we agreed to set aside any section of this bill that any Senator believed was expansive in scope and more than technical. For that reason, 21 sections of the original bill were removed and will be the subject of future hearings.

In the spirit of the cooperation shown in moving the original crime bill in 1984, I ask my colleagues to support final passage of this bill.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no further debate on the amendment, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1794) was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1795

(Purpose: To clarify the budget effect of the contract authority granted to the Director of Administrative Office of the United States Courts)

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I now send to the desk another amendment to the committee substitute and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] proposes an amendment numbered 1795.

On page 67, line 8, after "contract" insert ", subject to appropriations,".

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, section 16 of S. 1236 would restore the authority of the Administrative Office of the U.S. courts to contract for the care of addicted or drug dependent offenders. Today, I am offering a technical amendment to this section which simply adds "subject to appropriation."

The Budget Committee advises us that this amendment is necessary in order to avoid a conflict with section 401 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

Mr. President, I move adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1795) was agreed to.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, would the chairman of the committee yield for a number of questions?

Mr. THURMOND. I would be pleased to yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. S. 1236, as the Judiciary Committee reported it, does not include several changes proposed by the Department of Justice in S. 1236 as introduced. Now, it is my understanding the the committee intends to revisit these proposals. Its failure to adopt certain proposals should not necessarily be read as a rejection of those proposals. The committee simply has postponed consideration of them. Am I correct?

Mr. THURMOND. The Senator is correct.

Mr. METZENBAUM. As my colleague is aware, among the proposals not acted on was the proposal, in section 37 of S. 1236 as introduced, to amend section 235(b)(3) of the Sentencing Reform Act. Section 235(b)(3), as enacted addresses how the Parole Commission should deal with individuals who are slated to be in its jurisdiction 5 years after the new sentencing guidelines become effective. Section 235(b)(3) says the Commission must set release dates for each such person within the range of the applicable parole guideline.

The Sentencing Reform Act was intended to respond to the lack of predictability and the disparity of treatment that went with the parole system and the Parole Commission's decisionmaking. The Sentencing Reform Act limits the Commission's discretion before putting it out of business entirely.

As the statement accompanying the introduction of S. 1236 explained, section 37 was intended to let the Commission apply its guidelines with the discretion to go above or below them. Indeed, the explanation stated that under the current section 235(b)(3) "All release dates must be within the applicable guideline ranges" but this would not be the case if section 37 were adopted.

Is that the Senator's understanding of the proposed change?

Mr. THURMOND. Yes it is, however, I want to add that section 235(b)(3) as enacted provides an unjustified windfall to some of the most dangerous prisoners. The prisoners to whom this provision applies will be those who are serving the longest terms. This is the group most likely to have aggravating case factors warranting decisions above the applicable parole guideline range.

On the other hand, 235(b)(3) doesn't allow setting a release date below the guideline range in any circumstances.

Section 235(b), as enacted, establishes an absolute cut off of the administrative parole determination function. By contrast, under section 37 of S. 1236, as introduced, release dates and conditions of release are set by the Parole Commision and may be adjusted by the Bureau of Prisons after the demise of the Commission with the possibility that release could be ultimately set at an earlier date than the date set under section 235(b)(3), as enacted.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I disagree with your evaluation of this section. The Parole Commission guidelines already provide sufficient flexibility to address different degrees of seriousness in criminal offenses. The intent of this section is to reduce arbitrariness and inequities in setting release dates.

However, I do not want to imply that the committee has expressed a view on that proposal. I just want to be clear as to the issue the committee has decided to defer.

Under the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, the Parole Commission is required to set a "release date for an individual who will be in its jurisdiction the day before the expiration of 5 years after the effective date of this act that is within the range that applies to the prisoner under the applicable parole guidelines." This provision becomes effective on November 1, 1987. In addition, the Senate report accompanying the bill states that "the committee intends that, in the final setting of release dates under this provision, the Parole Commission give the prisoner the benefit of the applicable new sentencing guideline if it is lower than the minimum parole guideline."

Consequently, under current law, the Commission must stay within the guidelines for persons whose sentence extends beyond November 1, 1992, and who come before the Commission for a release date after the Sentencing Reform Act becomes effective on November 1, 1987. Consideration of amending this provision has been deferred.

Mr. THURMOND. Your statement of the committee's decision is correct.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the chairman.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I now move adoption of the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, is agreed to.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I would like to commend the Judiciary Committee for reporting S. 1236, which would make several important technical amendments to provisions enacted by the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984. The Judiciary Committee and the Justice Department have worked diligently to produce this legislation and as a strong supporter of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act, I am glad to support the amendments in S. 1236.

The Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984 was the product of long deliberation and effort by all three branches of Government, going back to the days when Senator John McClellan served as chairman of the Judiciary Committee. As finally passed, it included two tough provisions relating to bail reform and minimum mandatory sentencing for firearm crimes which I had sponsored in the Senate. In 1981, I introduced S. 494, which created a minimum 5-year sentence for the use of a firearm during the commission of a felonious Federal offense, to be imposed in addition to the penalty for the underlying felony. This bill increased the minimum penalty for first offenders from 2 to 5 years, and increased from 2 to 10 years the penalty for second and subsequent offenders. The bill also made such offenders ineligible for parole until that minimum sentence was served. It was a tough proposal. I am glad to say that language almost identical to S. 494 was included in the President's crime package 2 years later and eventually became part of Public Law 98-473, the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984.

I also introduced in the Bail Reform Act Amendments of 1981, S. 482, which required judges making bail determinations to keep in jail until trial those persons who could not be released without endangering the safety of other citizens. Bail reform was long overdue. Reforms strikingly similar to mine were recommended in 1981 by Chief Justice Burger and were also included in the 1984 act, now codified in 18 U.S.C. 3142.

Last December, I wrote Attorney General Meese to inquire into the effectiveness and utilization of the bail and firearms provisions of the 1984 act. In his response, Assistant Attorney General Bolton explained that the Department of Justice believes the bail provisions are proving to be a very effective tool of Federal law enforcement and are already working to keep many dangerous defendants off the streets while awaiting trial. In regard to the firearms provisions, Assistant Attorney General Bolton told me that they would become an effective law enforcement tool. He said, however, that legislation was needed if the minimum mandatory penalty for firearms crimes was to be made applicable to felonies involving the sale and distribution of narcotics. A group of Federal court decisions handed down in 1985, ending with United States v. Diaz, No. 85-1276, slip op. (2d Cir. Nov. 21, 1985), has made it apparent that the courts will not rule that felonies involving the sale and distribution of narcotics are to be covered by this provision unless Congress amends it to include narcotics offenses. The court in Diaz pointed out that criminals involved in drug trafficking may often carry or use firearms during the commission of drug-related felonies, and the current language of the provision does not apply to that type of felony. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter from the Attorney General's office be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, DC, February 24, 1986.

Hon. DALE BUMPERS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR BUMPERS: This letter is in response to your letter of December 20, 1985 to the Attorney General asking several questions about the utilization and efficaciousness of one of the bail provisions (18 U.S.C. § 3142), and one of the firearms provisions (18 U.S.C. § 924(c)) of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984. For the reasons stated below, the Department of Justice unequivocally believes that § 3142 and § 924(c) constitute sound public policy.

Since its enactment in October 1984, United States Attorneys have regularly utilized § 3142. As of January 10, 1986 Criminal Division statistics [1] show that 2,146 pretrial detention hearings have been held pursuant to § 3142. In 1,739 instances the courts ordered pretrial detention. In 1,303 of these instances the dangerousness of the defendant to others was an important consideration in the decision to order pretrial detention. These figures clearly indicate that § 3142 is regularly being utilized, and is proving to be an efficacious tool of federal criminal law enforcement. To the extent § 3142 denies pretrial release to those defendants who constitute a danger to others, the Department of Justice believes § 3142 will have a significant impact on criminal activity in that it will keep large numbers of judicially-determined dangerous defendants off the streets while they are awaiting trial on serious criminal charges.

With respect to § 924(c), it appears that United States Attorneys have been regularly utilizing this provision since its passage. While the Criminal Division has no statistics on the frequency of use of § 924(c), the Criminal Division has received numerous telephone calls from United States Attorneys seeking advice on whether to use § 924(c) in given fact situations. While it is too early to determine the efficacy of § 924(c), the Department of Justice has every reason to believe that § 924(c) will have a significant impact on criminal activity because it provides for longer periods of incarceration for those who use a firearm during the commission of a crime of violence. One problem that has arisen with respect to § 924(c) is that several district courts, and one court of appeals, have held that § 924(c) was not intended to apply to narcotics offenses. See United States v. Diaz, No. 85-1276, slip op. (2d Cir. Nov. 21, 1985). In Diaz the court of appeals stated that "narcotics offenses do not constitute crime of violence within the meaning of § 924(c). If felonies involving the sale and distribution of narcotics are to be deemed crimes of violence for the purpose of Section 924(c), we believe that this should be done by Congress amending the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984." Id. at 367. The Department of Justice has asked the Congress to amend § 924(c) so as to make it applicable to the sale and distribution of narcotics.

We trust this reply addresses the concerns raised in your letter.

Sincerely,

JOHN R. BOLTON,
Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs.

Mr. BUMPERS. Let me say, however, that I disagree with the court's failure to apply the minimum mandatory penalties of the 1984 act to narcotics offenses. As one of the chief sponsors of the 1984 minimum penalty provisions, I certainly intended that they apply to such offenses. In the event, because of adverse court opinions, congressional intent needs to be clarifed, and I had drafted legislation of my own to do so. I am very pleased to see that Senator THURMOND has included such an amendment in the bill we are passing today and also has made several necessary changes in the bail provisions.

I have long been an advocate of tough bail provisions which act to keep dangerous criminals off the streets, and minimum sentencing for drug-related crimes committed with a firearm appears to me to be absolutely necessary. I believe that there is not enough we can do in our efforts to deter violent crime and drug crime in this country. According to 1984 statistics, one violent crime occurs every 25 seconds in the United States. In Arkansas, violent crime including homicide, rape, robbery, and aggravated assault increased by 9 percent from 1984 to 1985. As the court in Diaz recognized, traffic in drugs is often accompanied by violence. Illicit drug use is spreading to persons of all walks of life and is victimizing children of all ages. I hope that applying a stiffer penalty to drug dealers who use firearms will establish a more effective deterrent to drug trafficking and bring us closer to a safe and civilized society for our children and future generations. I urge the immediate adoption of this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

So the bill (S. 1236), as amended, was passed as follows:

S. 1236

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

BAIL (CHAPTER I)

SECTION 1. (a) Subparagraph (D) of sectioin 3142(f)(1) of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by—

(1) striking out the words "any felony committed after the person had been convicted of two or more prior offenses" and inserting in lieu thereof "any felony if the person has been convicted of two or more offenses"; and

(2) inserting before the semicolon ", or a combination of such offenses".

(b) Subparagrph (A) of section 3142(f)(2) of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by inserting the word "or" after the semicolon.

(c) Subsection (f) of section 3142 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The hearing may be reopened, before or after a determination by the judicial officer, at any time prior to trial if the judicial officer finds that information exists that was not known to the movant at the time of the hearing and that has a material bearing on the issue whether there are conditions of release that will reasonably assure the appearance of the person as required and the safety of any other person and the community.".

OTHER SENTENCING AMENDMENTS

SEC. 2. (a) Section 4216 of title 18 of the United States Code is repealed.

(b) The item relating to section 4216 in the sectional analysis of chapter 311 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"4216. Repealed."

SEC. 3. Section 992 of title 28 of the United States Code is amended—

(1) in subsection (c) by striking out "section 225(a)(1)(B)(ii) of the Sentencing Reform Act of 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 235(a)(1)(B)(ii) of the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) The provisions of sections 44(c) and 134(b) of this title, regarding the residence of judges, shall not apply to any judge holding a full-time position on the Commission pursuant to subsection (c) of this section.".

SEC. 4. Section 994 of title 28 of the United States Code is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)(2) by—

(A) redesignating subparagraphs (D) and (E) as subparagraphs (E) and (F), respectively;

(B) amending subparagraph (C) to read as follows:

"(C) the sentence modification provisions set forth in sections 3563(c), 3564, 3573, 3582(c), and 3583(e) of title 18;"; and

(C) adding after subparagraph (C) the following new subparagraph:

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I wish to thank the able majority leader and the able Democratic leader for their cooperation in this matter. This is a very important piece of legislation. I feel it is going to make benefical improvements to the criminal procedures in this Nation.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman of the committee (Mr. THURMOND).

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRESSLER). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from South Carolina.

THE LIBYAN THREAT TO TUNISIA

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in the last few days, Americans have closely followed events in Libya. I have previously stated my support for the President, and wholeheartedly agree with our Commander in Chief, that repeated acts of Qadhafi-sponsored international terrorism ultimately forced our armed response.

Fortunately, the United States has the ability to organize and equip the type of self-defense mission which was launched on Monday. However, we have allies in that troubled region who are outmanned and outgunned by Colonel Qadhafi. I specifically refer to Tunisia and the threat Colonel Qadhafi poses to our friends in that country. Last June, Tunisian President Bourguiba visited the United States. I had the opportunity to meet with him. He is a fine man, and a true friend of our Nation. During that visit, President Reagan told President Bourguiba that the United States was committed to the sanctity of Tunisia's borders, and that Tunisia could rely on the continued support and friendship of our Nation. Based on present events in that region, the proximity of Tunisia to Libya, and recent history of aggressive acts Qadhafi has directed at Tunisia, I believe that we must now demonstrate strong support for our Tunisian ally. The basis for this view can be clearly shown by a brief overview of recent Tunisian-Libyan relations.

In 1976, Libya expelled almost 7,000 Tunisians. In 1978, it was strongly suspected that Qadhafi covertly organized riots in Tunis. In 1980, Libyan-trained commandos seized the town of Gafsa and unsuccessfully attempted to launch a coup against the Bourguiba government. Since 1976, 26,000 more Tunisians have been expelled from Libya. In the last year, Libya has violated Tunisian airspace on at least four occasions. Libyan military jets can fly from Libyan airfields, to the center of Tunisia and return to base in less than 10 minutes. Qadhafi has also attempted to discourage tourism in Tunisia, which is her second largest revenue producer. Qadhafi agents have attempted to smuggle letter bombs into Tunisia. He has tried to ruin the Tunisian economy by banning all imports from Tunisia and barring all Libyan travel to Tunisia. Libyan broadcasts into Tunisia have called on Tunisian soldiers to rebel against the Bourguiba government. In August 1985, relations between Libya and Tunisia further deteriorated when Qadhafi amassed 25,000 Libyan troops on the Tunisian border. Also that month, Tunisian Security Police intercepted a three-man Libyan hit-squad carrying explosives with the express intent of executing terrorist attacks against civilian targets in Tunisia. On September 1, 1985, Colonel Qadhafi clearly expressed Libya's position on the sanctity of the Tunisian border. He said:

We are one nation from the ocean to the Gulf and we do not at all recognize borders which the colonial powers have created in order to divide the Arab nation. From now on, we are going to support the achievement of Arab unity by force . . . . Arab unity can only be achieved either through revolution, something that we are promoting day and night, and by force, the use of which has become necessary. . . .

Because of numerous acts of Libyan aggression and threats, Tunisia broke all diplomatic relations with Libya on September 26, 1985.

Yesterday, Libyan radio once again appealed to Tunisians to overthrow the Bourguiba government. Libya claimed that President Bourguiba had allowed United States aircraft to fly over Tunisian airspace on Monday. Tunisia is the only Arab country that has failed to denounce our mission to Libya.

It is very clear that prior to this week Qadhafi's goals included either the overthrow of the present Tunisian government and the installation of pro-Qadhafi regime, or an invasion of Tunisia by Libya. Today Qadhafi is calling on all Arab nations to condemn the United States. Tunisia has already been the victim of Qadhafi's aggressions. It will certainly be even more vulnerable to Qadhafi-endorsed terror due to the friendship which exists between our Nations.

Libya has a 20 to 1 advantage over Tunisia in troops and in military equipment. This statistic is especially significant in terms of Libyan aircraft advantage. Last June, the President spoke of our commitment to Tunisia. Although it is my hope that the security of Tunisia will not be threatened in the coming weeks, I am not optimistic about the possibilities of such an outcome. Accordingly, we must be prepared to support our friends in Tunisia, and allow that nation the opportunity to defend herself against the Qadhafi menace.

Mr. President, I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. GORTON). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TASK FORCE ON TERRORISM

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, last July, President Reagan directed the formation of a task force on terrorism. Its purpose was to study and analyze national priorities, policies, and programs to combat terrorism. Adm. James L. Holloway III, former Chief of Naval Operations, served as Chairman of the task force. Admiral Holloway recently wrote an interesting article for The Officer, a publication of the Reserve Officers Association of the United States, regarding the findings and recommendations of the task force.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEAR OF TERRORISM RANKS HIGH IN PUBLIC CONCERNS

In late July the president directed the formation of a governmentwide terrorism task force, chaired by Vice President Bush. Its purpose was to review the national priorities, policies and programs to combat terrorism. The President requested that a report with appropriate recommendations be forwarded to him by the end of 1985.

On December 20, a classified report was submitted to the President. President Reagan approved the task force recommendations on January 20 and directed their implementation. One of the recommendations included a report to the American people. The public report of the Vice President's Task Force on Combating Terrorism was presented to the President on March 6.

The Task Force was made up of 14 senior administration officials. As a result, the report reflects the considered position of the executive branch.

During our deliberations we reviewed the significant literature on the subject, consulted with more than 100 experts on terrorism, toured appropriate government facilities, and received briefings from all government agencies concerned with terrorism. Additionally, the Vice President met personally with members of Congress, airline and media executives, distinguished diplomats, and former cabinet officials. Representatives of the task force traveled to 12 foreign countries and conferred with officials from many others.

The facts show that most international terrorism occurs in the Middle East and Western Europe. However, more terrorist acts were directed at US citizens in Latin America last year than in any other region. Both Nicaragua and Cuba have been implicated in terrorist activity in Latin America.

The task force found that terrorism has a substantial public impact far disproportionate to the numbers of Americans killed or wounded by terrorists. For example, last year there were 23 Americans killed in terrorist incidents overseas, and two Americans killed by terrorists within the United States. This contrasts to approximately 40,000 highway deaths and 18,000 homicides nationwide in an average year.

Yet, terrorism emerges as one of the things that most deeply bothers Americans. Terrorism, according to public opinion surveys, ranks near the top of their concerns, along with strategic arms control, the federal deficit and unemployment.

The principal conclusion of the task force is that US policies and priorities for combating terrorism are sound, well-conceived, and properly organized. We did, however, make a series of recommendations designed to enhance our efforts to combat the terrorist threat.

These recommendations do not purport to be a cure-all, but do represent some pragmatic and prudent measures that we believe will improve the efficiency of our organization and the effectiveness of our efforts.

Here are some of our principal recommendations.

In the area of National Policy and Programs, we propose:

A national programming document, designed to collect the many elements of the program into an integrated management system.

A realistic policy framework for senior decisionmakers, designed to provide consistency when dealing with terrorist incidents.

A full-time National Security Council position and support staff to strengthen coordination of the national program.

In the area of International Cooperation, we concluded that agreements with like-minded governments are critical to long-term success and can be achieved through multilateral and bilateral cooperation. We recommended that the State Department continue to seek this coordination through:

General resolutions from the United Nations and other specialized organizations.

Binding conventions on subjects such as hijacking and hostage-taking.

Revision of extradition treaties to close existing loopholes and ensure that terrorists are brought to justice.

In the area of Intelligence, we recognized from the outset of the Task Force deliberations the critical role played by intelligence in the national effort to combat terrorism. We concluded that the current intelligence produced on terrorism should be more predictive, with greater emphasis on the type of information needed by senior decisionmakers. We have therefore recommended:

Formation of a consolidated intelligence center specialized in terrorism, where a cadre of experts from various government departments and agencies would routinely and continuously analyze and process intelligence related to the terrorist threat.

Expansion of our effort in the area of human intelligence collection, which is essential if we are to be successful in penetrating terrorist groups and their support systems.

Enhancement of intelligence exchanges with like-minded foreign governments, with international law enforcement agencies and national police organizations.

In the area of Legislation, the Task Force observed that terrorism is a bipartisan issue. As the threat has increased, so has the resolve of Congress and the executive branch to ensure appropriate punishment of terrorists. Our recommendations concentrated on closing existing statutory loopholes in our ability to prosecute terrorists and reduce their sources of support. Some of our specific recommendations included:

Expand federal criminal jurisdiciton to allow prosecution of terrorists involved in assault upon U.S. citizens overseas.

Pursue legislation making terrorists found guilty of murdering an American during a hostage-taking situation, subject to the death penalty.

Limit the scope of the political offense exception to our extradition treaties, beginning with the US-UK agreement currently pending in the Senate.

Support the formation of a Congressional Joint Committee on Intelligence to streamline notification procedures in time-sensitive terrorist situations and reduce access to highly classified information.

In the area of Communication, we found that terrorism deeply troubles the American people. Americans believe terrorism affects the credibility of the United States as a powerful country and world leader. Americans want their government to do more to combat terrorism. Task Force recommendations were:

Increase the existing efforts to inform the American people about terrorism, emphasizing constraints imposed by the sovereignty of foreign nations and our own concern for human lives and the role of law. We think it important to carefully explain that the United States is prepared to respond to terrorists or sponsors of terrorism with force in a manner consistent with our democratic principles.

Cooperate more closely with the media during terrorist incidents.

Finally, I would like to emphasize that the very nature of terrorism makes precise assessment difficult. While terrorism poses no serious challenge to the national will or national survival, it remains a complex, dangerous threat for which there is no quick or easy solution. As Vice President Bush stated in the introduction to the report: ". . . I believe that the recommendations of our Task Force will significantly improve America's capability for combating terrorism. As long as vicious attacks continue, terrorism will remain a top priority of this Administration."

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

EDUCATION DAY, USA

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 582, Education Day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 582) to designate April 20, 1986, as "Education Day, USA."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ANNIVERSARY OF BAY OF PIGS INVASION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 599, commemorating the 25th anniversary of the Bay of Pigs invasion, which has just been received from the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 599) commemorating the 25th anniversary of the Bay of Pigs invasion to liberate Cuba from Communist tyranny.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, House Joint Resolution 599, introduced by Senator PEPPER on the House side, is a companion bill to Senate Joint Resolution 319, a resolution I have introduced in the Senate. This resolution commemorates the 25th anniversary of the Bay of Pigs liberation effort. I am glad the House has acted to approve this resolution. Both Senator PEPPER and I intend this resolution to be a special and appropriate acknowledgement in honor of the men of the 2506 Brigade. Their bravery and unhesitating response to the call of duty is to be admired by all.

We must not allow time to dim our memory of the heroes of the 2506 Brigade. They stand as shining examples of the Cuban people's love for freedom, their willingness to fight for democratic principles, and their vow to restore liberty to their homeland. Twenty-five years after the Bay of Pigs attempted liberation, the desire is just as strong, the resolve as profound, the yearning as sincere that Cuba should be free.

As lovers of freedom, as defenders of democracy, we do not rest while liberty is denied in Cuba, in Nicaragua, in Afghanistan, and Angola. The fight will continue against injustice, against oppression and tyranny so long as freedom loving people remain in chains.

I share with my constituents in the Cuban-American community the pride in the heroes of Playa Giron. In commemorating this attempt to liberate Cuba from Communist tyranny, we remember the brave men who fought and died in the battle to preserve freedom.

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, today marks the 25th anniversary of the Bay of Pigs operation. I believe that it is important that we remember the ill-fated Bay of Pigs operation because the lessons of the this episode are important for this country to understand.

Twenty-five years ago, over 1,400 Cuban exiles, known as the 2506 Brigade, landed on Cuba to overthrow the government of Fidel Castro. This force was sponsored and supported by the Central Intelligence Agency. Unfortunately, the Cuban Army successfully repelled the exiles in less than 72 hours. It has become clear that this exile force entered into the Bay of Pigs operation with the understanding that it would receive stronger military backing by the United States than it actually received. The effect of the weak backing by the United States was to leave a force of dedicated allies exposed on a beachhead and vulnerable to devastating fire by Castro's forces; 107 members of the exile force were killed in the operation.

Mr. President, the failure of the Bay of Pigs operation has had a profound effect on the United States and the security of the Western Hemisphere. First, the United States' failure to provide stronger backing to the exile force undermined our credibility as a reliable ally. We should have provided the support for the operation that would have guaranteed its success. No allies of ours should be expected to risk their lives in operations that we support if we are not intent on seeing the operations successfully completed. Our failure to provide strong and unequivocal support for the Contras in Nicaragua will similarly undermine our position in Central America.

Second, the failure of the Bay of Pigs operation has left us with a Communist, totalitarian state just 90 miles off our coast. This presence has caused us serious complications in military planning and represents an ongoing threat to our security. This threat brought this country as close to a direct confrontation with the Soviet Union as we have experienced in postwar history. The Cuban missile crisis was a direct result of the failure at the Bay of Pigs.

Finally, Mr. President the failure at the Bay of Pigs resulted in the consolidation of power by a regime in Havana that is dedicated to the cause of destabilizing the entire Western Hemisphere, that rejects the basic observance of the human rights of its citizens, and serves Soviet interests around the world. The failure to stop the consolidation of power by Fidel Castro with the minimal investment required 25 years ago, has resulted in far more expensive efforts to restrict his freedom of action now.

Mr. President, I salute the bravery of the 2506 Brigade in their stand for the cause of freedom, democracy, and security in the Western Hemisphere. I can assure them that we will not forget the lessons of the tragic history of the Bay of Pigs. These lessons must be remembered and the mistakes not repeated because there is too much at stake in the battle for freedom and democracy in this dangerous world.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

CONVEYANCE OF PROPERTY TO THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Governmental Affairs Committee be discharged from further consideration of S. 2251, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2251) to authorize the Administrator of General Services to convey property to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 2251 to authorize the Administrator of General Services to convey to the District of Columbia all rights to the property at 425 Second Street NW.

I visited that property. It is a physically depressed property, desperately in need of rehabilitation. But it is shelter for 900 to 1,000 homeless persons.

Passage of the bill fulfills a promise made by the administration and gives at least a bed and warmth to 1,000. It is a promise we must keep.

Here in our Capital City, as elsewhere in our country, there has been an explosion in the number of homeless persons. Homelessness has assumed proportions of a scale and complexity not seen since the Great Depression. Growing numbers of families, children, and the recently unemployed have become part of the dispossessed. It is a nationwide crisis demanding Federal attention, for the magnitude of the problem has increased beyond the capacity of local efforts.

The U.S. Conference of Mayors surveyed 25 cities whose mayors are members of the Task Force on Hunger and Homelessness. Their survey shows that homelessness has increased by 25 percent. In 60 percent of those cities, emergency shelters cannot accommodate all the people seeking assistance, and shelters routinely turn away people in need. Some 90 percent of the cities indicated that problems of the "new poor" continue.

There is a severe shortage of housing for low-income persons—and yet we cut back on housing subsidies.

Persons with chronic mental illness are among the homeless, but we continue to discharge the mentally ill from institutions without adequate provisions for care and supervision.

Youths who have "aged out" of the foster care system are among the homeless.

Twenty-eight percent of the homeless are families with children.

I have seen estimates as high as 2 million to 3 million homeless persons.

Immediate Federal action is needed to provide a rational, comprehensive initiative. We cannot continue to ignore the ill-housed, ill-fed among us. We must not force our most vulnerable and destitute to bear the burden of deficit reduction.

I intend to look into remedies for this tragic, national scandal.

Over the last few weeks I have been examining how to develop a comprehensive Federal initiative to care for the homeless. I intend to offer legislation in this area shortly.

Meanwhile, this bill is a small step toward better care for the homeless in Washington. But its passage should be viewed as the beginning of a congressional commitment to the homeless across America.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed, as follows:

S. 2251

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Administrator of General Services is authorized and directed to convey to the District of Columbia, without cost, all rights, title, and interest in the property located at 425 Second Street, Northwest, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

SUBSTITUTION OF CONFEREE ON H.R. 6, WATER RESOURCES BILL

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator of North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK] be substituted as a conferee on H.R. 6, water resources bill, in place of the Senator from Montana [Mr. BAUCUS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR STAR PRINT OF SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 313

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. HOLLINGS, I ask unanimous consent that Senate Joint Resolution 313 be star printed to reflect changes which I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The material is as follows:

S.J. RES. 313

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to be valid only if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after the date of final passage of this joint resolution.

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The Congress may enact laws regulating the amounts of contributions and expenditures intended to affect elections to Federal offices.".

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask the distinguished minority leader if he is in a position to consider the nomination of Richard T. McCormack to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Inter-American Foundation. If so, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session to consider the nomination.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, in response to the inquiry of the distinguished majority leader, I can definitely state this nomination has been cleared on this side of the aisle. We are ready to proceed.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be stated.

INTER-AMERICAN FOUNDATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Richard Thomas McCormack, of Pennsylvania, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Inter-American Foundation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ELECTRIC CONSUMER PROTECTION ACT

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, had I voted today on S. 426, I would have opposed final passage of the bill. I cannot, in good conscience, support this bill or any similar legislation until it can be demonstrated to me that the public will indeed be more efficiently served by such legislation.

Supporters of S. 426 have argued that under current law virtually every project currently held by investor-owned utilities will be turned over to municipal applicants. This is simply not true. The fact is that since 1970 there have been only 11 competitive cases out of more than 130 relicensing applications.

Recently, the CEO of Pacific Gas and Electric Co., acknowledged that, even if the law is not changed, "that doesn't mean ipso facto that municipals get to take over the project because * * * FERC applies the preference only if the two applicants are in equally good standing in what they propose to do with the project * * * We would expect to prevail on that basis by showing that our plans for the future development of these projects are superior to those of our competitors."

Although South Dakota currently is not directly impacted by the legislation, my principal concern is over precedents which may develop. I want to be certain that the implications of this legislation are carefully considered to see that they are in the best interests of the public.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my remarks be entered in the RECORD in connection with the vote on final passage of S. 426.

DEATH OF NORMAN L. CAHNERS

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, many people in the Greater Boston area and elsewhere were saddened by the recent death of Norman L. Cahners. Norman Cahners was a creative and omnipresent force in the business, civic, and charitable worlds. His public spirit, generosity and concern for the enrichment of the cultural, intellectual and artistic dimensions of our society were demonstrated time and time again throughout over four decades of service to Greater Boston and New England. The vast diversity of his interests and his energies was reflected in the numerous prestigious awards he received throughout his lifetime.

To name but a few, he won acclaim for developing innovative procedures for materials handling in World War II; for his dedicated involvement with the Boy Scouts of America; and for his outstanding leadership, achievements and ethical standards in business and in the community.

I ask unanimous consent that the Boston Globe article about Mr. Norman L. Cahner be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORMAN L. CAHNERS

Although he knew he was battling a fatal illness, Norman L. Cahners had hoped to join a Museum of Science group now visiting the Amazon and viewing Halley's Comet. The indomitable drive of this business and community leader, who died last Friday, enabled him to live and travel well beyond the limits of most dreams.

Among the many Boston educational, medical and cultural institutions that Cahners served as a trustee, board member and worker, the Museum of Science was a special challenge, because he felt that he could make a contribution to integrating the work of the institution with community life.

Cahners' skill as a leader first became apparent when he was a top sprinter on the 1936 Harvard track team. During World War II, while serving in the Navy, he developed techniques for the rapid handling of war materiel and started a magazine on materiel-handling that dealt with the transport of all kinds of supplies and goods.

Based on that experience, Cahners began to publish industrial magazines in many technical fields. Today, the company has become the largest publisher of industrial magazines in the world.

In his private life, Cahners often counseled talented young people on career decisions, keeping track of them for years to see what turn their lives had taken.

His business success made possible major contributions to many schools and institutions. With his late father-in-law, Sidney Rabb, he established a professorship in psychology at the Harvard Business School.

Creation of a "climate of excellence" in industry, to enable persons to rise as high as their abilities can take them, was a special interest. Too often, Cahners felt, the human element was neglected by industry leaders.

In a lifetime of exploring how things work and ways to build an environment in which people can work better, Cahners set a path worth following.

UNITED STATES SHOULD SUPPORT AIRCRAFT SALES TO TAIWAN

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, Senator GOLDWATER is urging the sale of advanced interceptor aircraft to Taiwan. I agree with him on this issue. I believe the United States must develop a balanced and careful policy for dealing with arms sales to Asia and that the United States has both a legal and moral obligation to support Taiwan.

Mr. President, the administration has a policy of opposing continued Soviet encroachment in Asia. This policy is correct, as far as it goes. However, some factions in the administraton are under the futile illusion that this policy can be implemented by a United States buildup of the mainland Chinese military machine. Some are even attempting to create a strategic alliance with mainland China. This is the very China which just condemned the United States for self-defense actions in Libya.

Mr. President, it is crucial that the United States protect and defend Taiwan. Building a mainland Chinese military machine with United States weapons and technology is not the way to do it. It makes no sense at all to attempt to build a military alliance with mainland China while neglecting Taiwan, a long-term ally and proven friend.

Mr. President, my colleague, Senator GOLDWATER, has made a cogent case for a United States sale of F-20 aircraft and modern equipment to Taiwan to enable that ally to patrol and defend the sealanes in the Pacific against a dramatic increase in Soviet air and naval activities in that area. I agree with him absolutely on this matter. Taiwan geographically is in a key position in the center of the sealanes and airlanes used by Soviet forces transiting to and from bases in the Soviet maritime provinces and Vietnam. A credible and coherent United States defense policy in Asia must include Taiwan. I believe that the U.S. Senate must devote careful and serious thought to this subject. For this reason, I ask unanimous consent that an article by Senator GOLDWATER be printed in the RECORD.

[From the Conservative Digest, May 1986]

SENATOR GOLDWATER URGES SALE OF NEW AIRCRAFT TO TAIWAN

(By Barry M. Goldwater)

The Republic of China, now on Taiwan, is one of our oldest and best friends. We fought side by side in China during World War II. After the war, this same Ally was literally forced off the mainland by a Communist regime to which our government, in a rather foolish and stupid move, acquiesced. In doing this, nonetheless, we promised the Taiwanese that we would guarantee their freedom and would keep them supplied with appropriate weapons so that they might defend themselves.

This understanding was in great shape until someone in the State Department started talking in China and in the United States about what amounted to a double-cross of Taivan, and this caught the ear of Henry Kissinger. Henry undoubtedly thought that would be a fine idea, and he convinced President Nixon to take steps to start the derecognition of the Republic of China on Taiwan and the recognition of the People's Republic as the only China by admitting the representatives of Peking to the United Nations.

President Carter carried this a step further by abrogating the mutual defense treaty with Taiwan and closing off our formal recognition. Small as it is, Taiwan has the tenth largest flow of exports in the world. It is an economic wonder, and has one of the most modern economies in all of Asia. Yet, incredibly, its representatives are not even allowed in official places in Washington. As shameful as this is, the worst point is that we, as a nation, broke our solemn word to this true and steadfast Ally.

To show how unpopular that betrayal was with the average American citizen, Congress was forced to pass the Taiwan Relations Act. The question now arises, are we living up to our side of this Act? In my humble opinion, being a frequent visitor to Taiwan, we are not.

For instance, we are not selling them the new aircraft they need and want to buy. True, we do supply them with the parts with which they can make a new version of an old airplane. But I have investigated this matter thoroughly, and I can tell you they need far more than old airplanes. We are not doing anything about that, and we should.

When President Reagan came to office, I thought, "Surely this danger to Taiwan will now vanish," because all through his 1980 campaign for President he kept professing his love for, and great loyalty to, the free Chinese people of Taiwan. It didn't take long, though, for even my friend Ronald Reagan to fall under the spell of whoever concocts that witch's brew in the State Department. He joined his predecessors in non-recognition of Taiwan; and, worse still, in not allowing the proper military assistance to that country.

In other words, we have double-crossed an old friend. This friend could make the difference between our maintaining our strong position in the far Pacific, or losing it altogether. The Russians are now making flights over the far Pacific. Not just once in a while, but in regular patterns. And these flights extend down as far as The Philippines. Indeed, the Soviets now occupy Cam Rahn Bay, a huge facility built with American money during the Vietnam War and now being rapidly improved by occupying Russian forces. All of this is very serious.

What, in effect, we have done by our failure to keep our word to the Republic of China on Taiwan is to allow a potential enemy open access to the far Pacific. And let us remember that the perimeter of the Pacific offers the only future for peace in this world. Not only that, but it holds the economic future of the world as well. Adding to the theat is the fact that if we lose the far Pacific we lose our access to the Indian Ocean through the Straits of Malacca. The Russians would then move to control every ocean strait in the world, assuring them of international economic superiority.

I don't like to make this kind of report, but I have been asked by Conservative Digest what I found on my last visit to Taiwan and that part of the world. I am just reporting it as I saw it. We have been derelict in our duties to an old and proven friend. I don't like it one bit, and I think I am joined in this by many Americans.

A TRIBUTE TO MARION EASTERLING

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I bring to the attention of my colleagues an article which appeared on March 5, 1986, in the Independent Advertiser in Clanton, AL, about Marion Wesley Easterling.

The article, written by Advertiser correspondent Madge Mullins Wilbanks, chronicles the life of one of Chilton County and Alabama's most outstanding citizens.

As most of my colleagues know, gospel music has held a special place in southern life for decades. The article titled, "Gospel Legend Lives in Clanton," pays tribute to one of America's most beloved gospel song writers.

The songs composed by Marion Easterling have been recorded by America's most famous gospel quartets and have been published in countless songbooks since 1937 when he composed his first gospel song, "Lord, Lead Me On."

Marion Easterling's contributions to America have contributed to our one nation under God concept.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD this beautifully written salute to Marion Easterling.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOSPEL LEGEND LIVES IN CLANTON

(By Madge Wilbanks)

On October 25, 1973, the Chilton County Chamber of Commerce honored Marion Wesley Easterling "for his accomplishments in the field of gospel music and prestige and dignity brought to our county." The wooden plaque complete with gold mounting is in the home Marion W. Easterling shares with his wife, "Miss Agnes", in Clanton. It is a warm house filled with tributes momentoes of years, pictures of children and the four grandchildren and there is also golden records by the Thrasher Brothers singing songs written by this gospel giant of a song writer who has a part of the Chilton County scene since being born on March 12, 1910, on a farm near the Sunshine Community "Out Refuge Road" to General Francis and Dora Johnson Easterling.

In thinking back over the years, it seems Marion was simply born to gospel music. He attended the public schools in Chilton County and then attended various music schools including the Vaughan School of Music. He studied with a number of famed and excellent private teachers of gospel music schools as Adgar M. Pace, O.L. DeVaughan, W.B. Abert and "Dad Speer" (G.T. Speer) of the famed Speer Family. He also took correspondence courses from New York and Chicago to further his own musical education. With Marion W. Easterling, it was not hard work nor hard study, it was all part of his lifelong goal. . . . to bring gospel music through the media of radio to his beloved Chilton County and to his cherished homefolks . . . and he had done just that in a most exemplary fashion!

He has realized his goal to bring gospel music programming via radio to the people of his home county. He has realized his goal and yet he continues to write and dream . . . an ever-working mind of a composer whom gospel music ranks right up there at the top.

How does he write his songs? "Well, I get a melody or words . . . most often the words first . . . and it may be as long as two years before I write it down, have it copyrighted and send it to the publishers." He is represented by SESAC. Year and years ago he told me that he often sold his songs (all rights and everything!) for as little as $10. I reminded him of that the other day and he remembered. He sold two of his all time big hits for $10 "and I might not even get that" . . . songs like "Standing By the River and Rainbow of Love." Somehow you know however, without him even saying it, that he never has written a song with the hope of making money. He has written songs simply becaue he had the God-given talent to do this. It is as much as a part of his life as life itself . . . and he, happily, has shared his amazing talent not only with hometown people but his songs are sung "All over the world wherever English is spoken" he says with much just pride all tinged with humility and reverance to the God that gave him the talent in the beginning from life's start on 1910.

Music? All part of life of this man with whom I have personally shared at WKLF Radio most of this time since 1947 when I was there because Joe Phillip Klinner, my best friend, was a disc jockey and since I was hanging around I got on the air playing on that rattling studio piano, "Because", "Ah! Sweet Mystery of Life" and Irving Berlin's beloved, "Always." I was in the ninth grade as was Joe . . . and my days of writing commercials for WKLF Radio was beginning . . . and had begun to continue until this day as has Marion W. Easterling's gospel program . . . how good and kind Marion always was to a little frightened girl who was new at the radio business . . . he was so helpful and I am ever grateful . . . as are many to whom has given so, so much.

His first song to become "a hit" was written in 1937, "Lord Lead Me On." It can be found in all the convention song books. Other "hits" included those especially dear to the heart of this amazing musician: "Standing By the River", "Rainbow of Love", "When He Reached Down His Hand For Me", "When I Wake Up To Sleep No More . . ." the number of songs he guesses he's written "Is around 300 or so I'd say," and he says this with a humbleness that is found in composers of songs that will long outlive their composers . . . songs that, in truth, are timeless and will never cease to be sung by lovers of gospel music, the gospel music of Marion W. Easterling of Clanton, Alabama.

While he was writing all the time, he was also teaching singing schools and doing evangelistic work in Florida as well as in Alabama. At Sunshine Church he had one of the largest Church he had one of the largest singing schools with over 200 students some of the time! The singing schools would be taught every day for seven days in the week. His work has been interdenominational. He has also done editorial work for some leading publishers and, in 1938, was the youngest composer to sign a five year contract with Stamps-Baxter Publishing Company.

Awards? A key to the city of Cleveland, Tennesee in 1969 . . . The Broadcast Media Gospel Award in Nashville in October, 1976. Awards in the hearts of his thousands upon thousands of listeners all these years at WVOK in and later in Clanton at WKLF Radio. For a while he had an early morning show/program of gospel music at WVOK and then would hurry home to do the 11:30 morning gospel show from WKLF Radio! He is in his 39th year of broadcasting with his first radio broadcast coming on WKLF RADIO on Tuesday morning, December 2, 1947 at 11:30 . . . a programming that has continued until the present time . . . unbroken . . . He has done nearly 20,000 radio programs when they are all put together . . . The Guinness Book of Records can find no one to top that number and, after consulting with Marion W. Easterling (upon his request) will wait until he closes out his program to put this verified fact into the Book of Records . . . but the truth is there! As Marion says, with a chuckle, "I'm the worlds oldest D.J.!"

Marion W. Easterling, the composer of gospel songs, shares another life as Marion W. Easterling, husband of Miss Agnes, who was a Hughes before her marriage to Marion. The couple has two sons, Lynn Wesley, a graduate of Samford University teaches in Oak Grove near Hueytown where he lives with his wife, Terry Lynn, and son, Michael Lynn, 15, and daughter Aeryn, 8. As Mrs, Easterling says, "It's a houseful of Lynn's!" And so it is! Lynn Wesley was born in the Chilton County Hospital but that was not the case with second son, Ray Mell, who was born at home and then rushed by the new Martin ambulance to the hospital along with his mother . . . thus the name "Mell" for J. Mell Martin who began Martin's in Clanton in 1921. Ray's wife is named Mary and their daughter, Kim, is a student at the University of Montevallo. She has only 40 percent hearing and was a poster child for the Hearing and Speech Therapy Program under Governor Albert Brewer while he was governor of Alabama. A second daughter, Beth, is 15 years old and a student at Pelham High. Ray went to Troy State and is now employed by Mid-South Company which deals with heavy equipment.

As we are winding down our talking and forth like good and long-time friends will tend to do and with "Miss Agnes" ever near to help take care of this most special composer and credit to Chilton County, he said, "Well I never made to much 'sign', I just wrote my songs." I asked him what he meant by the word 'sign'? He thought a moment and answered, "like making a big name for yourself. . . . I never thought about that. . . . I just wanted to go on writing my songs. . . ." And so he has, and so he has for the world of gospel music to know and cherish and for groups like the Thrasher Brothers, The Florida Boys, The Happy Goodman Family, The Conner Hall Group and Big Jim Waites (dean of bass singers) to make famous as is the name Marion W. Easterling wherever gospel songs are sung and known . . . Yesterday . . . today . . . and tomorrow . . . you know, he has made his very own personal 'sign' after all . . . and what a great, great legacy from "the little man with a million friends, Marion W. Easterling."

SAUDI ARMS SALE

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, earlier today the Senate Foreign Relations Committee heard testimony on Senate Joint Resolution 316, disapproving the sales of arms to Saudi Arabia.

I ask unanimous consent that my statement from this morning's hearing be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE
HEARING ON SAUDI ARMS SALE

(Statement of Senator Alan Cranston)

Mr. Chairman, as the principal sponsor of the resolution against this sale—a resolution now co-sponsored by 63 of my colleagues—I want to outline briefly my reasons for pressing this issue.

I also want to state again, as I have on previous occasions, that my disagreement with the Administration is over means, not ends. Our dispute is not partisan. I opposed a President of my own party when he proposed an arms sale to the Saudis. Nor is our difference personal. We simply have a fundamental disagreement over how best to purse U.S. interests in our relationship with Saudi Arabia.

Senators oppose this arms sale because we do not believe it serves American national security interests to reward nations which consistently thwart American policies. We believe that the United States should demonstrate resolve and courage in standing up to third world dictators and potentates who scorn our interests. And we believe—given the lack of urgent need for this latest shipment of missiles to the Saudis—that this is a very appropriate time to send this strong signal to Riyadh.

The Administration arguments attempting to justify this sale have been very, very weak. They've asserted that it is needed to counter "the Iranian threat", they've argued that it will have favorable impact on our balance of trade, and they've maintained that we need to "get back to business as usual" in arms sales to the Saudi kingdom.

The one point proponents and opponents agree on is that the debate over this arms sale is, indeed, a signal-sending exercise. And a large number of Senators clearly wish to send a signal that the United States expects some minimal concern for our interests, too, as a condition of our friendship.

Over the past thirty-two years, the United States has sold to Saudi Arabia nearly $50 billion worth of arms and defense services. Each time the Saudis have made these sales a "test" of American friendship. Once again the pending sale of missiles is being characterized as a "test" of American friendship.

I want to ask you in all sincerity, Mr. Secretary; "when does America pass the test? When do we earn the right to ask from the Saudis sensitivity to America's basic concerns?"

The Saudis keep wanting us to prove our friendship.

When do they prove their friendship?

Is it impractical to ask that the Saudis stop funding terrorists and their supporters?

Is it unreasonable to ask that the Saudis stop their public support for Colonel Qadhafi?

Is it unrealistic to ask the Saudis to let up on their boycott of American firms and American workers who choose to do business with our ally Israel?

From the 1981 AWACS sale, to the Reagan Plan, to the Murphy shuttle, to the more recent Bush mission, Administration leaders have met with rejection when they sought Saudi cooperation in pursuing three crucial American interests in the Middle East. Republicans and Democrats, and the legislative and executive Branches are absolutely united on those objectives:

1. We seek to combat terrorism and deny terrorists any support or safe harbor;

2. We seek to expand the peace process begun at Camp David;

3. We seek to enhance the economic and military security of our key allies in the region, Egypt and Israel.

But the Saudis have failed to help us in any meaningful way. Worse yet, they have actively opposed us, they have bankrolled terrorists and their supporters including the PLO and Syria and publicly supported Colonel Qadhafi. They have undermined the peace process. They have expanded the Arab boycott of American firms and American workers who choose to do business with our ally Israel. They punish Egypt for making peace with Israel by refusing to restore diplomatic relations.

I know, Mr. Secretary, that the Administration asserts that the Saudis are doing a lot "in private." I've read the State Department's White Paper on how "the Saudis, within the context of the Arab consensus, have made constructive contributions to the search for peace" (emphasis my own).

That is not good enough. We have a right to expect from the Saudis more than the lowest common denominator of the "Arab consensus" of which you speak—which still calls for the isolation and annihilation of our allies.

Mr. Secretary, I have a number of questions this morning. But let me first add a personal word.

I do not relish the confrontation ahead.

The Administration's confrontation should be with Riyadh, not with American senators.

I am not happy about the necessity of sponsoring resolutions designed to bar an intended Presidential action.

I have urged for two years that the Administration not proceed with this sale—at least until we get some meaningful support from the Saudis on our anti-terrorism efforts or on the peace process (as the President pledged would be the case in his letter to Senator Baker at the time of the September 1981 AWACS debate).

I renew that suggestion once again. Now is not the time to ship lethal arms to those who stand with terrorists in the Middle East.

PROHIBITING SALE OF SOUTHWEST POWER AND OTHER FEDERAL MARKETING ADMINISTRATIONS

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, a move has been underway for some time now for the Federal Government to realize short-term financial gains and forsake future revenues by selling off Federal power agencies, including the Southwestern Power Administration headquartered in Tulsa, OK.

I must rise in opposition to proposals to sell off resources of the Southwestern Power Administration due to the impact such a move would have on Oklahoma industry, agriculture, and individual electric consumers.

With this in mind, I join my colleague from Washington, Senator EVANS, in introducing legislation which would, for a period of 10 years, prevent Federal actions aimed at disposing of power production facilities which generates electricity marketed by Federal Power Marketing Administrations.

Mr. President, the Southwestern Power Administration provides electricity generated from 23 dam sites to customers in 7 States, including Oklahoma. In Oklahoma, an estimated 1 million people, or nearly one-third of the population, receive some portion of their power through the Southwestern Power Administration. Twenty-five rural electric cooperative distribution systems market power obtained from the SWPA.

Rural electric utilities and municipalities that purchase SWPA power serve over 900 manufacturing firms with 56,000 employees which add more than $1.3 billion to the region's economy. Additionally, there are nearly half a million farms in counties served by rural electric cooperatives which purchase power from the SWPA and the production from these farms is estimated to reach $19 billion per year. Mr. President, I cite these figures to demonstrate how deep the power marketed by the SWPA cuts into the area economy.

The sale of Federal hydroelectric projects would result in the trading of lower interest rates that were in effect when the projects were built for higher rates that prevail today. Based on projections obtained from the Oklahoma Association of Electric Cooperatives, the refinancing costs associated with the sale of the SWPA would, over the next 5 years, result in a $272-million cost increase to the seven-State region served by the SWPA. The projections assume the SWPA purchase to be financed beginning at 10.5 percent in 1986 dropping to 6 percent in 1990. As my colleagues can see, relatively conservative assumptions were used to make these projections.

Mr. President, I mentioned electric customers in the seven-State region would be asked to bear an estimated $272 million in increased costs if the SWPA is sold. To bring things home for my colleagues, I would like to break this figure down on a State-by-State basis. Arkansas consumers would face a $48.96 million increase; Kansas, $21.76 million; Louisiana, $21.76 million; Missouri, $87.04 million; Texas, $38.08 million; and Oklahoma, a $54.4 million hike in power costs. Again, these figures are based on refinancing costs alone.

The electricity currently produced by Power Marketing Administrations is sold at rates based on cost, not profit. Under the law, agencies such as the Southwestern Power Administration are obligated to return all cost of construction, operation and maintenance for Federal power production and transmission, including principal and interest. Last year, the agencies returned to the Government more than $1 billion in principal and interest.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation. The permanent loss of these productive assets would cost the Government billions of dollars in future revenues. I suggest we should not act in such a short-sighted manner.

NUCLEAR TEST MORATORIUM

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, on Thursday, April 10, the United States conducted its eighth nuclear underground test since Mikhail Gorbachev announced the Soviet Union's moratorium on all nuclear testing in August of 1985.

The significance of the U.S. test in Nevada is that it will trigger a resumption in Soviet nuclear weapons testing. In the process, the United States will have lost both an important opportunity to resume negotiations on achieving a comprehensive test ban and a valuable first step in concluding a mutual and verifiable arms-control treaty.

The administration's position on joining the Soviet moratorium has been clear. It has been willing to forgo its extensive nuclear weapons testing program to advance the cause of arms control. At the same time, the administration has clearly justified its opposition to a testing moratorium on the basis of inadequate verification and jeopardy to the reliability of the U.S. nuclear weapons stockpile.

Mr. President, let me take a moment to examine these arguments:

First, with regard to verification, the administration has long alleged, most recently in the President's February 1986 Soviet noncompliance report that "Soviet nuclear test activities for a number of tests constitute a likely violation of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty of 1974." As my colleagues will recall, the signed but unratified TTB Treaty prohibits underground explosions with yields exceeding 150 kilotons.

Therefore, the administration, according to the logic of its position, had no intention of rewarding Soviet noncompliance with an existing agreement by acquiescing in a nuclear test moratorium for a limited period of time.

Yet Mr. President, according to recent press reports, the Central Intelligence Agency has changed its procedures for estimating the yield of large nuclear tests because its previous estimates were too high. Seismological experts outside the government have long argued for just such a change. As a result, because of the significant ambiguities involved in seismic monitoring, the Soviet Union's likely violations may have never been violations at all. In fact, under the same methodology used to assess the size of Soviet tests, it is entirely possible that some United States nuclear weapons tests may have themselves appeared to the Soviets to exceed the imposed 150-kiloton limit.

There is no doubt that the huge uncertainties involved in seismic monitoring can today be reduced to acceptable levels with readily available technology for on-site monitoring at Soviet and U.S. test facilities. The question, then, is how to proceed to implement such a program of effective monitoring.

The approach I continue to favor is to simply join the Soviet Union in its proposed moratorium for a limited period of time, or as long as the Soviet Union continued to refrain from testing in order to negotiate and implement more rigorous nuclear testing verification procedures.

Such procedures could set the stage for a comprehensive test ban and further limitations on testing which could be beneficial in negotiating a new strategic arms agreement. Yet it is clear that this administration has no intention of taking any action which would enhance verification at the expense of nuclear weapons development and deployment.

That is why I recently joined my distinguished colleagues, Senators CRANSTON and HATFIELD, in cosponsoring S. 2220, legislation which would prohibit the use of funds for the testing of United States nuclear warheads so long as the Soviet Union showed similar restraint. Our legislation would not prohibit use of funds for preparations for testing, including all necessary steps short of actual tests, so that we would be ready for an immediate resumption of tests if necessary. Funds would be available for the resumption of United States testing immediately upon evidence that the Soviets had violated the moratorium—a fact which could be verified by the United States intelligence community.

Unfortunately, the failure of this administration to join the Soviet Union in a moratorium has made the Soviet resumption of nuclear testing a self-fulfilling prophesy.

Mr. President, the second argument advanced by the administration in justifying opposition to the test moratorium revolves around the reliability of our nuclear weapons stockpile. It is argued that without testing, the United States could not diagnose and remedy serious shortfalls in the safety of our nuclear stockpile or the reliability of our nuclear weapons.

The fact is, few U.S. nuclear tests have ever been dedicated to specifically corrobrating design flaws discovered in the examination of the nonnuclear components of nuclear weapons. Rather, the overwhelming majority of tests are dedicated to validating nuclear weapons designs and testing new concepts for future weapons development. In short, testing for this administration is all about enhancing nuclear warfighting capability and developing nuclear powered star wars lasers and weapons.

Certainly, the safety and reliability of our nuclear stockpile cannot be ingored. However, this issue can be adequately addressed through an arms control agreement which establishes procedures through which specific very low-yield tests could be allowed for purposes of ensuring the safety and reliability of remaining weapons.

But the key again is the will to eliminate nuclear tests dedicated to the development of new weapons—and the existence of a regime of on-site inspection at respective United States and Soviet nuclear test facilities.

By failing to join the Soviets in a testing moratorium, the United States has closed the door on such possibilities and allowed the Soviets to score a huge propaganda gain.

Mr. President, let me close by reiterating that a huge opportunity has been lost to end the nuclear arms race. Our own security would have suffered minimally from taking the risk of joining the Soviets in their proposed moratorium. Many of our questions regarding the Soviets' real motivation in proposing a moratorium will remain unanswered. As a result, the cause of peace will suffer.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 133

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the requirements of Section 657 of the Department of Energy Organization Act (P.L. 95-91), I hereby transmit the Seventh Annual Report of the Department of Energy.

RONALD REAGAN.

ANNUAL REPORT ON THE STATUS OF THE NATIONAL WILDERNESS PRESERVATION SYSTEM—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 134

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Wilderness Act of 1964 (Public Law 88-577), I herewith transmit the Twenty-first Annual Report on the status of the National Wilderness Preservation System for calendar year 1984.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 17, 1986.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 10:48 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker appoints Mr. HOWARD and Mr. SHUSTER as additional conferees on the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1128) to amend the Clean Water Act, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

At 12:00 noon, a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bill:

H.R. 4551. An act to extend for 3 months the emergency acquisition and net worth guarantee provisions of the Garn-St Germain Depository Institutions Act of 1982.

The enrolled bill was subsequently signed by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

At 1:49 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 410) to repeal the Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate; it agrees to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. DINGELL, Mr. MARKEY, Mr. HALL of Texas, Mr. BROYHILL, and Mr. MOORHEAD as managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following joint resolution, without amendment:

S.J. Res. 303. Joint resolution to designate April 1986, as "Fair Housing Month".

The message further announced that the House has agreed to the following concurrent resolution, without amendment:

S. Con. Res. 128. Joint resolution to commemorate the bicentennial of Australia and to honor the April 1986 visit of Australian Prime Minister Robert Hawke to the United States.

At 4:12 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following joint resolution, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.J. Res. 599. Joint resolution commemorating the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Bay of Pigs invasion to liberate Cuba from Communist tyranny.

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS

The following communications were laid before the Senate, together with accompanying papers, reports, and documents, which were referred as indicated:

S. Con. Res. 132. Concurrent resolution establishing a temporary joint committee on the budget; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. GORTON:

S. 2318. A bill for the relief of William G. Riplinger; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF WILLIAM G. RIPLINGER

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing legislation I introduced last Congress for the relief of William G. Riplinger of Seattle, WA.

On November 22, 1977, William G. Riplinger was offered the position of contract price analyst, grade GS-11, step 10, with the U.S. Navy's Supervisor of Shipbuilding, Conversion and Repair (SubShips) in Seattle. He accepted, resigned from a position in private industry, and reported to his new job on December 3, 1977.

On reporting for work, Mr. Riplinger was informed that his actual appointment would be as a grade GS-11, step 1. The U.S. Government admits that, due to administrative error, the Consolidated Civilian Personnel Office [CCPO] of SubShips failed to request authorization to appoint Mr. Riplinger to the 10th step of GS-11. On December 16, 1977, the personnel director of CCPO requested approval from the Seattle regional office, but the request was denied.

On February 8, 1978, the commander of the Naval Sea Systems Command requested approval of the step increase from the Civil Service Commission, which granted approval on March 23, 1978. However, back pay for the period from December 3, 1977 to March 23, 1978 was denied. Mr. Riplinger seeks $1,641.12, which represents the difference between the pay he would have received had he been placed in step 10 of GS-11 as of December 5, 1977, instead of March 23, 1978, and the pay he actually received. He also seeks $182.35 in attorney fees.

Mr. Riplinger initiated litigation to recover this back pay, but was denied relief in Federal court. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals noted in its opinion that "all parties admit the correctness of Riplinger's factual recitals, and all should admit the equity of his claim, but it is well-settled that the law provides no relief."

A private relief bill is the only avenue available for Mr. Riplinger to receive the equitable relief he deserves. I therefore urge the prompt and favorable consideration of this legislation.●

By Mr. INOUYE (for himself and Mr. MATSUNAGA):

S. 2320. A bill to amend an act to add certain lands on the Island of Hawaii to Hawaii Volcanoes National Park, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

ADDITIONAL OF CERTAIN LANDS TO HAWAII VOLCANOES NATIONAL PARK

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, my colleague, Senator SPARK MATSUNAGA and I are introducing today a bill that addresses the need to acquire a parcel of land immediately adjacent to Hawaii Volcanoes National Park. A parcel of land long listed as the National Park Service's highest acquisition priority in the Pacific area of the National Park System. The acquisition of this roadless, and presently unused, area of superb native ohia and treefern rain forest has been a priority because it has been identified by biologists as an ecosystem not now adequately encompassed and protected in the National Park System. Further, and equally important, it contains the habitat of the critically endangered Hawaiian Hawk and the Hawaiian O'u, as well as several other species indigenous to the Hawaiian Archipelago. Congress identified this same parcel as suitable for "potential wilderness" in 1978 when it was found to possess all the necessary attributes for wilderness designation excepting its non-Federal status.

While these considerations are enough to warrant the inclusion of the tract within the National Park, another consideration germane to the merits of acquiring this tract is that the growing of marijuana on lands within this tract poses a serious threat to public safety. The need to keep this illegal activity undetected has motivated some growers to booby trap their patches and to physically intimidate anyone who inadvertently might come upon them. National Park Service vigilance has eradicated marijuana growing within the confines of Hawaii Volcanoes National Park and it is expected that the same vigilance will end marijuana growing in this contiguous land area once it is added to the park.

Over the past 5 years this important tract of land has been the focus of other activities which have led to this call for acquisition that Senator MATSUNAGA and I bring to you today. In early 1982, the owner of this tract of land revealed plans for large-scale geothermal development on the land. Approximately 50 geothermal wells were proposed to be sited 1,000 feet from the park boundary. Four proposed power plants were to be located within 4,000 feet of the park boundary. The State of Hawaii recognizes the need to develop alternatives to nonrenewable energy resources and has emphasized this need through State legislation, the State also recognizes the important of maintaining the integrity of Hawaii's largest national park. Adverse impacts resulting from geothermal emissions, surface disturbance, noise, odor, and vista impairment in such close proximity would include deterioration of native plant and animal communities, fragmentation of the ohia-fern forest essential for endangered native bird survival, degradation of the wilderness quality of the east rift and Kalapana extension areas, and degradation of present and future visitors perceptions of the national park.

At the recommendation of the State of Hawaii Board of Land and Natural Resources, the owner was encouraged to consider a land exchange with the State of Hawaii. At the same time, the State encouraged the National Park Service to find a way of acquiring the tract for inclusion into Hawaii Volcanoes National Park. At that time the tract in question was not considered part of the two-party land exchange proposal. As a logical extension of this type of low cost transaction, the State of Hawaii began to explore the possibility of a three-party land exchange with the Federal Government that would effectively allow the National Park Service to acquire this important parcel if the State and the landowner agreed to move forward with their two-party exchange inclusive of this important tract.

Mr. President, my colleague and I, come before the Senate to urge the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to allow the Department of the Interior to become a third party to this exchange initiative.

It is important to note for the purposes of this bill that Congress recognized the need to adjust the boundaries of Hawaii Volcanoes National Park through the addition of adjacent lands early in the park's history. In 1938 Congress passed legislation that allowed the Secretary of the Interior to add adjacent tracts to the park if, in the discretion of the Secretary, they are judged to be "necessary for the proper rounding out" of the boundaries. While the Secretary has had this discretionary power for close to 50 years, he has been restricted by the provision that allowed acquisition of certain tracts through donation only, including the tract that is the subject of this legislation.

The reasons for limiting the acquisition of this adjacent parcel to donation only have long been forgotten. The possibility that they cease to exist is supported by public acceptance of the acquisition proposal. There is consensus among the people of the State of Hawaii, the landowners, and the National Park Service that the time for acquisition is now at hand. Times have changed and it is incumbent upon us to recognize the need to change with the times. The proposed three-party land exchange is the type of change that is appropriate at this time. Further, Mr. President, in his testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee in fiscal year 1986 budget hearings, the Secretary of the Interior stated the administration's support of exchanges, when he stated the Department's intent to emphasize the acquisition of lands through means other than Federal appropriations, further citing an example of land exchanges for park lands. In all candor, the time for low cost acquisition alternatives are needed in the context of the Federal deficit.

The benefits emanating from this legislative effort are self-evident. First, the 5,650-acre tract of virgin rain forest would become part of the national park, thus offering protection to endangered species and popular visitor attractions, allowing representation of this unique ecosystem in the National Park System, and facilitating national park administrative control over the land for purposes of public safety. Second, geothermal development could proceed in an area well removed from the presence of the park, thus allowing geothermal development to proceed immediately without the onus of continued hearings, protests, appeals, and threats of court actions which have held development to a standstill over the past 4 years. Most importantly, it eliminates the need to seek major appropriations from Congress for land acquisition of the land at a time when budget considerations are on the minds of all of the Members of this body.

Mr. President, the benefits of this piece of legislation are far beyond the normal scope of a bill of this nature. I urge the support and efficient passage of this bill by my colleagues.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2320

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. ADDITION TO HAWAII VOLCANOES NATIONAL PARK.

The Act entitled "An Act to add certain lands on the island of Hawaii to the Hawaii National Park, and for other purposes" (52 Stat. 781; 16 U.S.C. 391b) is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"SEC. 5. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the 'Secretary') is authorized to acquire by purchase with donated or appropriated funds, donation, or exchange the land and interests therein comprising approximately 5,650 acres and identified as tract number 118/22 on the map entitled 'Recommended Land Acquisition', in the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park Land Protection Plan as recommended May 17, 1985, which plan shall be on file and available for public inspection in the office of the Director, National Park Service, Department of the Interior, Washington, D.C. and the Office of the Superintendent, Hawaii Volcanoes National Park, Hawaii.

"(b) In exercising his authority to acquire the real property referred to in subsection (a) by exchange, the Secretary may accept title thereto and in exchange therefor he may convey to the grantor of such real property title to any United States Government real property under his administrative jurisdiction, other than real property within or administered as a part of the National Park System, in the State of Hawaii which he determines is suitable for such exchange. The values of the properties exchanged shall be approximately equal, or if they are not approximately equal, the values shall be equalized by the payment of money to the grantor or to the Secretary as the circumstances require. In no circumstance shall an equalization payment exceed one-fourth (25 percent) the appraised value of the real property referred to in subsection (a). Any money paid to the Secretary shall be deposited as miscellaneous receipts in the Treasury of the United States.

"(c) Real property owned by the State of Hawaii or any political subdivision thereof may be acquired only by donation or exchange.

"(d)(1) In order to facilitate the acquisition of the real property referred to in subsection (a) by exchange, notwithstanding any other provision of law, upon request of the Secretary, the Administrator fo General Services shall transfer to the Secretary, without reimbursement, administrative jurisdiction over any excess or surplus United States Government real property in the State of Hawaii for purposes of such an exchange.

"(2) For purposes of a land exchange with the State of Hawaii, the Secretary shall consult with the State of Hawaii in the process of identifying suitable exchange lands belonging to the United States Government.

"(3) For the purposes of a land exchange with the State of Hawaii, real property owned by the United States Government and selected for use in a land exchange shall not be from among those lands ceded to the United States Government.

"(e) The real property acquired by the Secretary pursuant to this section shall be administered by the Secretary as part of Hawaii Volcanoes National Park, subject to the laws and regulations applicable to the Park.

"(f) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the acquisition of real property under this section.".●

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I am today joining my senior Senator from Hawaii, Mr. INOUYE, in introducing S. 2320, a bill providing for authority to exchange Federal lands for State and private lands. In doing so, I am reminded that the ancient Hawaiians were noted for the importance which they placed on working together, a practice called Laulima. The Hawaiian economy was comprised of small communities, each specializing in the cultivation or gathering of a few staple products. Thus, the communities were dependent upon one another for provisions which they did not produce but needed. This interdependence necessitated cooperation on the part of each community. Without it their survival was in jeopardy.

The bill which my distinguished colleague from Hawaii and I are introducing today is a modern example of the kind of cooperation which existed among the ancient Hawaiians. There are three parties involved in the proposed land exchange described in S. 2320, amending an act to add certain lands on the island of Hawaii to Hawaii Volcanoes National Park. These parties include the State of Hawaii, the James Campbell Estate, and the U.S. Government via the National Park Service. All parties involved are supportive of our proposal.

The parcels of land in question include: First, State-owned lands in the Kilauea East Rift Zone; second, James Campbell Estate-owned land at Kahauale'a adjacent to the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park; and third, excess or surplus U.S. Government real property in the State of Hawaii.

Each of the concerned parties in the proposed land exchange has a special interest in a particular parcel of land, but acquisition of that particular parcel is dependent upon the expressed agreement of the other two parties. Just as the ancient Hawaiians found themselves being dependent upon neighboring communities, the parties involved in S. 2320's proposed land exchange find themselves dependent upon the others in order to consummate the exchange—an exchange which should prove to be beneficial to all parties involved.

The State-owned lands in the Kilauea Middle East Rift Zone is of interest to the James Campbell Estate because they have been designated by the State's board of land and natural resources as a geothermal resource subzone and the estate would like to conduct some geothermal exploration and development there.

The Campbell Estate-owned land at Kahauale'a includes a parcel referred to as "tract 22." Tract 22 is a land parcel adjacent to the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park which has been of considerable interest to the National Park Service for some time. The Land is a virgin 'ohi'a and fern rainforest and has been identified by the Park Servie as its No. 1 acquisition priority for protection of the Thurston Lava Tube and Chain of Craters Area. Tract 22 also serves as the natural habitat of at least nine different endangered species, inlcuding the rare Hawaiian 'O'o bird.

The excess or surplus U.S. Government real property in the State of Hawaii which would be included in the proposed three-party exchange has yet to be identified—not because there is none available, but because the State hopes to be able to discuss and identify potential properties with the Federal Government and come to a mutual agreement on them.

To date, the State of Hawaii has consented to exchange its land from the Kilauea Middle East Rift Zone for the Campbell Estate-owned land at Kahauale'a including tract 22. However, this consent was given on the condition that the Federal Government enters into the exchange as a third party. Achieving this, tract 22 would then be transferred to the National Park Service.

The James Campbell Estate has consented to the exchange and has urged the inclusion of tract 22 in order to facilitate its acquisition by the National Park Service. It is important to note here that the enabling legislation for Hawaii Volcanoes National Park specifies that even though the tract is within the authorized boundaries of the park, the land can only be acquired by donation.

Furthermore, it should be understood that in 1983, the State of Hawaii conducted a statewide review of geothermal resource lands and in December of 1984 its board of land and natural resources rendered a decision and order [D/O] giving conditional approval for the designation of a portion of Kahauale'a as a geothermal resource subzone. The D/O also requested that the Campbell Estate investigate and consider a land exchange of State-owned lands to the north of Hawaii Volcanoes National Park and Kahauale'a, pending the outcome of the D/O conditions. Thus, whether or not the land exchange between the estate and the State of Hawaii takes place, a major portion of Kahauale'a will be designated a geothermal resource zone.

Of greater importance, since the State's consent for the land exchange is dependent on the participation of the Federal Government, the integrity of Hawaii Volcanoes National Park is dependent on legislative action that this Congress takes to involve the Federal Government in this land exchange process. Lacking this, the valuable tract 22 will remain in the possession of the Campbell Estate and potential development threats to Hawaii Volcanoes National Park will not have been effectively removed.

Mr. President, earlier I spoke of the virtues of the Hawaiian practice of Laulima, the spirit of cooperation and working together. It is on that note that I urge expeditious approval for Federal involvement in the proposed three-party land exchange. The other two parties are dependent on participation of the Federal Government. Federal law currently prohibits acquisition of certain parcels of land except by donation and all that is lacking here is congressional action to mandate Federal Government participation in what appears to be a mutually beneficial process for all concerned. As we say in Hawaii, "E ho'olaulima kakou"—Let's work together to make it a reality.

By Mr. ARMSTRONG:

S. 2321. A bill to suspend temporarily the duty on d-6-Methoxy-α-methyl-2-naphthaleneacetic acid and its sodium salt; to the Committee on Finance.

TEMPORARY SUSPENSION OF DUTY ON NAPROXEN

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to temporarily suspend the duty on naproxen and naproxen sodium, chemicals used in prescription drugs here in the United States. The first stages of these chemicals are manufactured in the United States and are then shipped to the Bahamas and Ireland for the final stage of manufacture. The products are finally shipped back to the United States for distribution.

Current importations of these products are duty free under the Generalized System of Preferences and/or the Caribbean Basin Initiative or duty refundable under drawback. Duty paid in 1985 was reported as $1.55 million, however, net duty was less than $400,000 after drawbacks. Considering this fact, a temporary duty suspension will create no appreciable loss of revenue to the Treasury.

The manufacturing process as well as the products affected by this legislation are patented in the United States and the patent will not expire until 1992. As drafted, the duty suspension will end in 1989. Therefore, temporarily suspending the duty will harm no other domestic producers since no others exist for these products.

The processes involved in the production of naproxen and naproxen sodium comply fully with all FDA regulations, requirements, and inspections. In addition, these products were granted eligibility for duty free status in the Bahamas in 1981. At the time of ITC's review, no controversy arose with respect to these chemicals.

Currently, duty drawback procedures are time consuming and costly. They necessitate extensive recordkeeping by the importer as well as a significant expenditure of time by U.S. Customs in entry processing and audit procedures. Due to the lack of audit staff at Customs, the backlog of unaudited drawback entries continues to grow. Therefore, the passage of this legislation to temporarily suspend the duty on these noncontroversial products would result in a savings of time and resources both to the Government and the importer without any detriment to domestic interests and little, if any, net loss of revenue.

I urge my colleagues to favorably review this legislation.●

By Mr. SIMON (for himself, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. DENTON, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. HEFLIN):

S. 2322. A bill to provide for a study of television programming to consider the matter as to what impact, if any, violence on television has on the health of children and adults; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

S. 2323. A bill to exempt certain activities from provisions of the antitrust laws; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TELEVISION VIOLENCE

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am introducing today two bills cosponsored by Senators THURMOND, METZENBAUM, DENTON, DECONCINI, and HEFLIN, that deal with the problem that is a major problem in our country, and that is television violence. According to the Nielsen index, the average American child watches 18,000 television murders before he or she graduates from high school. We have reports from the Surgeon General of the United States, the National Institute of Mental Health, the American Psychological Association, and American Academy of Pediatrics, all saying we are doing harm to ourselves. Even the Screen Actors Guild has passed a resolution saying we have to do something about violence on television.

I got interested in this, frankly, back a couple of years ago. I checked in a motel—and all of us who are in the U.S. Senate spend more time in motels than we like to spend—I checked in and turned on the television and all of a sudden in front of me, in living color, someone was being sawed in half by a chain saw. And I have to tell you it bothered me that night. I could not help but think what happens to a 12-year-old, what happens to a 10-year-old.

It is clear that we have a problem. All of these studies all show the same thing. The only study that shows television violence does not do any harm is one authorized by NBC. It is a little bit like the Tobacco Institute research showing cigarettes do not do any harm. It is slightly suspect.

The American Academy of Pediatrics' Policy Statement on Children, Adolescents, and Television finds that:

Repeated exposure to televised violence promotes a proclivity to violence and a passive response to its practice.

In an article in the Pediatrics magazine, Dr. James Holroyd wrote:

In one study, children who had watched the violent television program were found to be more likely to hurt another child than were those who had watched a nonviolent program. In nonlaboratory settings, children have injured themselves by imitating behaviors viewed on TV. Another study suggested that children may learn to perceive aggressive behavior as normal and acceptable. Other studies have shown that these findings persist even when factors such as family background are taken into account. In a study of 158 elementary school children from a middle-class suburb, children who watched more violent television programs were rated by their teachers as less cooperative, less successful in interpersonal relationships and less happy; these findings were statistically significant regardless of the children's age, sex, social class, IQ or parents' television viewing habits.

In another article some months later in the same magazine, Drs. Robert Wharton and Frederick Mandell, among other things, point this out:

. . . 35 young men between the ages of 8 to 31 years have killed themselves playing Russian Roulette while imitating a scene from the movie, " 'The Deer Hunter,' which they had seen on television." "The pain of victims and anguish of relatives are rarely portrayed. Thus, the child learns that violence may be a quick and easy solution to conflicts while being deprived of any opportunity to feel empathy for the victim."

While these studies have primarily dealt with what happens to children, there have also been studies of what happens to adults. First of all, when you ask adults who watch television a great deal what they estimate as the incidence of crime, the estimates are way above the reality, so that adults who watch television a great deal end up with a great deal more fear of crime than reality suggests should be the case.

Television could appeal to either the best in us or the worst in us. And when we have too much violence on television, it appeals to the worst in us.

The bills that I have introduced basically permit an exemption from the antitrust laws so that the television networks and cable and the independents can get together to establish guidelines. It does not call for censorship. I am an old civil libertarian. I do not believe in moving in that direction. But I think we have to recognize that we have a serious problem.

What some people have suggested is, "Well, if violence is so bad, then we are going to have to also have some standards on the news." The reality is that violence on the news is a very different thing, because violence on the news shows reality and it shows the good guys as well as the bad guys suffering form violence. What happens on television entertainment is that the heroes and heroines, no matter what they do, they do not suffer greatly, while the villains are the people who suffer. And so, since we all identify ourselves as the good guys, we think, by example, the violence and the problems are going to be on the other side. The reality is if we reduce TV violence we are going to reduce crime in our country. I think that is the clear lesson from the studies that have been made.

I hope this body will consider this bill and move rapidly in this direction. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to have printed into the RECORD articles from the New York Times and also the Chicago Sun Times on this subject.

There being no objection, the aticles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VIOLENCE ON TV SPURS INCREASED ADULT SUPERVISION

(By Nadine Brozan)

The show is violent but the children are determined to watch, so what is a parent to do? Turn off the televised beatings, murders, knives, guns, chains, fires, cars hurling off cliffs and victims being thrown out of airplanes, or simply turn away? Although definitive links are hard to establish, psychologists and other authorities in the field generally accept that watching violence on television can affect the way children view the world and the way they relate to others, that it can anesthetize their responses to cruelty and suffering or make them excessively fearful.

Indeed some experts feel the connection is so strong that, as Arnold Kahn, administrative officer for social and ethical responsibility at the American Psychological Association, put it: "The debate over the effects of violence on television watchers is like the debate over cigarette smoking and cancer."

The association is the latest organization to join the National Institute of Mental Health, the Surgeon General, the National Parent-Teacher Association and others in warning parents to monitor their children's viewing habits. Recently, the American Psychological Association issued a resolution asking parents to do just that and asking the broadcasting industry to reduce violence in programs.

Yesterday in Washington, Senators Paul Simon, Democrat of Illinois, and Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, suggested to a hearing held by the National Council of Churches several tactics that could be used to protect children from violence and sex in television and movies without abridging Americans' right to free speech. The council, with 31 member churches covering 40 million people, held earlier meetings in New York and Hollywood on the subject and said it will issue a report in the fall on its findings.

Senator Specter said boycotting products advertised on these shows would be a "traditional and nonobjectionable" way to bring about change. He also raised the possibility of improved "lock-boxes" to screen out certain television channels, and tax incentives for producers who design programs especially for children.

Senator Simon proposed that certain shows might carry a warning to steer parents away from programs. Peggy Charren, president of Action for Children's Television, a citizens' group working to improve children's television, said she favors legislation that would require each station to air five hours a week of programming designed to enhance children's education.

"ACT believes it is the responsibility of parents, not lawmakers, to keep their children away from adult programs they find inappropriate," she said. "But parents cannot guide their children to suitable alternatives if those alternatives do not exist."

Still, recognizing the potential harm in television violence is one thing; many parents have found that it is another matter altogether to keep children from watching the shows all their classmates discuss—"Miami Vice," "Airwolf," "A-Team," "Fall Guy," Magnum, P.I." and "Matt Houston," for example, as well as cartoons whose heroes battle and defeat all villains, and wrestling matches, which seem to be particularly popular among youngsters and many adults today.

According to an informal survey of parents in the metropolitan area, responses run the gamut from removing the set from the home to permitting children to be the sole arbiters of what they watch. Most parents seem to take a position somewhere between the two poles, and for each family the line of acceptable television fare falls in a different place.

Thomas Levy, for example, does not subscribe to cable television because it adds to the violence already on the screen. Diane Hockstader lets her 11-year-old daughter watch pretty much what she wants, as long as it does not exceed an hour a day during the week. Randy Gottesman-Smolian once taped a cartoon of "Garfield" the cat, after her 3-year-old son seemed scared of an animated panther, and decided that for him, the "Garfield" show was unsuitable. Meanwhile, Nancy Gallin worries about violence on news programs and in documentaries.

How a family can progress from total abstention from television to a fairly permissive stance is typified by the Reilly family of Manhattan. The parents, T. Gorman and Janice Reilly, did not own a set until their son Justin, now 12½ years old and a student at Hunter College High School, was in first grade. "Then he began to plague us for one because he found that he was literally a social outcast," Mrs. Reilly said. "He had no notion of what the other children were talking about. He could not carry on conversations with them about the 'heroes.' Superman, Batman and the like. He was so adamant that we gave in and got a set for Christmas."

Now, Mrs. Reilly says, she is concerned about the violence witnessed by Justin, and to a lesser degree, by her younger son, Gabriel, 3½. "So many of the programs that Justin likes are violent," she said. "He used to sleep late Saturday mornings, now he makes sure that he's had breakfast and is up in time to watch wrestling. It's a hot commodity at school." Why, she was asked, had she capitulated? "Because he took such a strong stand and because he's cooperative and reasonable," she said. "And, taking the bigger picture, he really doesn't have much time to watch." Still, the doubts linger. "Television hasn't affected his behavior," Mrs. Reilly said, "but sometimes he laughs hysterically at violent actions and that disturbs me."

All the parents interviewed agreed that it takes tenacity to enforce rules and resist imploring. "We've tried to impose a time limit of one hour a day," said Mr. Levy of Pleasantville, N.Y., "but that works better in theory than in practice." Although he does worry about violence on television and has noticed his sons, Arthur, 14, and Douglas, 12, imitating television programs and characters in their play, he said: "We are not all that careful. We don't do any precreening other than reading reviews. We don't censor what they watch, they do see 'A-Team' and Knight Rider,' but we don't have cable because we would lose control even more."

The choices are limited by the boys' bedtimes, 9 and 9:30 P.M. "Most of the worst shows tend to be on later," Mr. Levy said. "Still, we should probably be more assiduous, but there are so many things to get on them about. We do what we can in the context of our lives and our life styles."

Nancy Gallin, who has seven children ranging in age from 16 years to 2 months, said she is more concerned about the news. "The only one of my children who watches anything else objectionable is Joshua, who is almost 15, and he watches 'Miami Vice' as end-of-the week relaxation," she said. "But occasionally during the news, I say the little kids, the ones under 11, must leave the room. You see children dying in fires, and I find myself having to remind them that most people are good parents who love children."

Margaret Howard, mother of a 14-year-old daughter and twin sons, age 8, said: "My greatest claim to fame is that I've never let my younger children watch 'A-Team.' And 'Knight Rider' is their favorite show, but they've only seen it at a friend's house. I sometimes think that the reason they like violent programs is that it's something they don't have to share with adults, the way they do with 'The Cosby Show,' so they can have the programs all to themselves."

"The rule about excessively violent shows is 'In this house, you don't watch it,'" Mrs. Howard said. "I try not to have lots of nos, but the ones I do have are absolutes. I have no shred of doubt that I am doing the right thing."

And yet, even she has given in. "They do watch cartoons Saturday morning and I don't say no because I'm weak," Mrs. Howard said. "They don't watch TV during the week and I can't be totally rigid." She also follows a course advocated by many experts. "I make it clear," she said, "that there are alternatives, that they can watch other programs or rent video films."

Some parents use television violence as an opportunity for family discussions on human relationships, on sensitivity, on the distinctions between reality and fiction.

Rarely do Fred and Joan Bondy allow their 12½-year-old twins, Matthew and Jessica, to watch programs of which they disapprove. When permission is given, however, Mrs. Bondy said: "We say, 'If you must watch, then we'll watch with you,' and we point out the improbabilities. I have told them, for instance, that in the Miami Police Department, the police do not have yachts, sports cars, pet alligators, they do not enjoy the night life. I impress upon them that 'Miami Vice' is simply not reality."

Then there is the approach taken by a Manhattan mother of two children, ages 11½ and 8, who did not want her name divulged. "I figured that once they went to nursery school and found out there was something other than Channel 13 it was all over," she recalled. (Channel 13 is the local public television station in the New York area.) "And sure enough, the first day at nursery school, my daughter ran around screaming, 'Batman, Batman.' It didn't matter what I allowed because other influences would work their way in; I couldn't prevent exposure to nonpositive television."

"I took the tired way out," she said, "the single-parent way out, the path of least resistance."

But she also believes that viewing overt violence is not as harmful as more subtle forms of maltreatment. "How about Archie Bunker as a role model? Does an 8-year-old realize that he is satirical?" she asked. "I would rather have them watch James Bond than 'The Love Boat,' in which three different romances come out perfectly with no effort. I think that's more destructive."

PROGRAMMED TO KILL

(By Daniel Ruth)

Leslie Shearer and Richard Clark were buried the other day. They were two unwitting actors in a 36-hour, all-too-true drama starring John Pasch Jr. in the biggest role of his life.

For the last decade, police and neighbors note, the unemployed 57-year-old recluse has lived a lonely existence in his DePaul area apartment. He was a citizen of another world, another reality; a regular customer at the theater of the absurd—television.

One week ago, Pasch allegedly gunned down his landlord—the 45-year-old Shearer—and Chicago policeman Clark, 48, who had arrived to investigate reports of a shooting. Pasch then fled to the apartment of Jean Wiwatowski at 1427 W. Lill and barricaded himself inside with the elderly woman.

As police surrounded the building in what would become the longest hostage crisis Chicago history, the 300-pound Pasch calmly ensconced himself in an easy chair and proceeded to watch television, a friend to the friendless.

By all accounts, Pasch was "addicted" to television, his only source of solace and reality for the last 10 years. And several experts on the psychology of television overexposure, especially violent programming, suggest Pasch subconsciously viewed the Lill Street standoff as a possible extension of the vicarious life he lived through the screen.

"It looked like his whole life was around that TV," said Area 6 Cmdr. Edward Wodnicki.

"He was upset at being disturbed," Wodnicki said, adding Pasch seemed more composed and calm when police called only during commercials.

Indeed, Police Department negotiations timed their contacts with Pasch to commercial breaks in programs he was watching, which included the movie "Battle of the Bulge" and the series "Miami Vice."

During the course of the 36-hour ordeal, the only demand Pasch made to police was to have the current edition of TV Guide sent into the house.

If not for the loss of life, the standoff with Pasch and his curious indifference to armed police circling the house would seem almost comical.

But the Pasch case sadly speaks to the potential volatile influence that excessive, long-term television viewing can exert on extremely lonely and depressed psyches.

"We're on real thin ice as to whether this guy had any vestige of sanity," said Ken Howard, a clinical psychology professor at Northwestern University. "I would imagine he had a sense of having killed someone in the [same] sense that Don Johnson kills anybody on 'Miami Vice.'

"I think he was honestly shocked [after the shootings of Shearer and Clark] that there wasn't a commercial.

"Obviously he's got serious emotional problems." Howard said, adding that the stability of characters Pasch viewed on television may have become reference points for his own stability. "That became his reality—the people he was watching. He knew what was there [on television] and he could depend upon it and it overwhelmed whatever sense he had," Howard said.

In 1972 and in an updated 1982 report, the U.S. surgeon general's office concluded there is a link between excessive exposure to television violence and aggressive behavior. The average viewer is exposed to 13 acts of violence and hour on television, ranging from murder and rape to pushing and shoving, said Thomas Radecki, a psychiatrist and chairman of the National Coalition On Television Violence, based in Champaign.

Radecki said a recent California study indicated that when normally aggressive adult males reduced their exposure to television violence to between 10 and 15 hours a week, they also experienced a 35 percent decline in the times they lose their tempers.

The average American child witnesses 18,000 television murders before he graduates from high school, said Sen. Paul Simon (D-Ill.), who next week will introduce a bill to reduce the level of violence on television.

"There's no question that we, through constantly watching violence on television, accept the fact of violence in our lives much more easily," Simon said.

"Television is a permit for murder," Radecki said. "It makes it look easy." At the same time, he said the profusion of violence on television "teaches us to deal with conflict—with violence," thus creating "a culture of violence" in American society.

In 1977, Miami attorney Ellis Rubin attempted to defend 15-year-old Ronnie Zamora against murder charges by arguing Zamora was induced to kill his next-door neighbor because the boy was addicted to television.

Called the "Kojak defense," Rubin argued that Zamora, a fan of "Kojak," saw himself as the TV detective when he fantasized his neighbor's house was being broken into. Zamora entered the house and when the neighbor unexpectedly returned, Rubin argued, Zamora then assumed the identity of the intruder and shot the neighbor. He stood over the body and told her it was all right to stand up, Rubin said.

Rubin lost the case and Zamora was sentenced to life imprisonment. But since then, the "Kojak defense" has become a more common legal tactic.

"My defense was a certain element of insanity can be induced by excessive viewing," Rubin said.

Simon's proposed legislation would attempt to reduce those excesses, by permitting a waiver in antitrust laws to allow the three television networks, cable networks and independent television stations to collaborate on a code of standards to regulate violence in programming.

"If the networks can get together and adopt a common code, then in fact we can reduce violence on our television screens and reduce the violence in our society," Simon said.

Radecki is not so sure. "Violence segregates the viewing public," he said, adding violence attracts predominantly male viewers, who then can be targeted for specific advertising messages. "We've taught the males in our society to be violent so we can sell them beer and automobiles."

At the time of the Zamora trial, Miami psychologist Arthur Stillman was hired by the state to refute Rubin's defense. But now, Stillman believes excessive television viewing can influence behavior.

"If a person sits that way [watching television for long periods of time], his whole life becomes what he sees on television," Stillman said. "I'm sure what he [Pasch] went through, he saw [on television].

"They've lost the ability to discern between fantasy and reality," he said.

Excessive exposure to anything, including watching television, ultimately will affect a person's perception of reality, said George Gerbner, a nationally recognized expert on the influence of television on American society.

But Gerbner was less inclined than his colleagues to suggest that excessive viewing of violence can directly beget violence.

Instead, Gerbner argued that people who isolate themselves through their televisions tend to grow more insecure and distrustful of others.

And when that insecurity is threatened, the person may lash out because of fear, he said.

During the Lill Street siege, a neighbor from the same apartment building told Sun-Times columnist Tom Fitzpatrick that Pasch "almost panicked when I tried to build a darkroom in the other half of the basement. He was afraid I was going to cut off his escape route in case of a fire. I don't know what the technical term is for being afraid to go outside, but that's what is wrong with him."

For 36 hours Pasch sat and watched television, while the police outside sat and watched Pasch. The screen "Kept his [Pasch's] mind off what was going on," Cmdr. Wodnicki said.

At last, after a lonely existence in a filthy apartment, John Pasch was a leading man as local television news accounts chronicled the standoff. "He loved every minute of it." Wodnicki said. "He got attention. He got something he never got for a long, long time.

"We were giving him exactly what he wanted," Wodnicki said.

The irony of the Pasch case is that he likely will spend the rest of life in a mental institution or a prison cell, places where days turn into nights with unending monotony. Places were there is little to do, except watch television.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I also urge my colleagues in this body to take a look at these bills to see if they would maybe want to add their names as cosponsors. I am pleased the Presiding Officer, Senator DENTON, is one of the sponsors, along with Senators THURMOND, METZENBAUM, HEFLIN, and DECONCINI. I think we show a broad spectrum of interest in this problem.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bills be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2322

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Federal Communications Commission shall conduct a study for the purpose of determining the impact, if any, that violence on television, including cable, has on the mental or physical health, or both, of children and adults. The Commission shall report the results of such study, together with its comments and recommendations, to the Congress prior to the expiration of the twelve-month period following the date of this resolution becomes law.

S. 2323

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) actions specified in section 2 shall be exempt from certain provisions of the antitrust laws of the United States.

(b) FOR PURPOSES OF THIS ACT—

(1) "antitrust laws" has the meaning given such term in the first section of the Clayton Act, and the Federal Trade Commission Act;

(2) "broadcast station" means a television broadcast station or a cable system.

(3) "person in the television broadcasting industry" means a person who is the chief executive officer of a television network, and the presidents of the National Cable Television Association and the Association of Independent Television Stations, Inc., or their designees; and

(4) "television broadcast" means any program broadcast by a broadcast station.

SEC. 2. The antitrust laws shall not apply to any joint agreement by or among persons in the television broadcasting industry, or to any joint action in reviewing, considering, evaluating, or taking action with respect to any television broadcast or any material intended for any television broadcast if the purpose of such agreement or action is to determine or alleviate the negative impact, if any, of violence in such television broadcast material.

SEC. 3. The exemption provided in section 2 shall not apply to any joint agreement, understanding, or action which is intended to result in a boycott of any other person in such industry.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I rise in support of the legislation introduced by my distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. SIMON], to address the serious problem of television violence. I commend the good Senator for his leadership in this area and am pleased to join as an original cosponsor of this effort.

Mr. President, the National Institute of Mental Health, the Surgeon General of the United States, the American Psychological Association, the American College of Pediatrics, as well as other groups, have all demonstrated a causal connection between violence on television and an increase in behavior disorder and greater violence on the part of the viewers. The problem is particularly troublesome in the case of juveniles.

In fact, in a hearing conducted by the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice in 1983, testimony was received from the juvenile leader of the Guardian Angels, a New York City youth gang, that the increase in youth crime was directly related to the lack of role models or to the presence of negative role models on television and the movies. The juveniles found themselves emulating the antisocial and violent behavior of the television characters. They also found themselves becoming desensitized to violence.

Mr. President, while the legislation offered by Senator SIMON will not be a cure-all for the complex problem of television violence, it does represent a very important positive step in the right direction. The legislation will permit the television networks, the independents, and cable television companies to meet and take action to determine and alleviate the negative impact of violence in television broadcast, without violating Federal antitrust laws. Federal antitrust laws will remain in effect for all other activity.

The legislation also provides that the Federal Communications Commission shall conduct a study of television programming to consider as to what impact, if any, violence on television has on the health of children and adults. I fully expect that this study could collect, review, and update past studies which attempted to address this complex issue.

Mr. President, this legislation represents a reasonable approach toward addressing the serious problem of television violence. I urge my colleagues to support the legislation.

Mr. HATCH for Mrs. HAWKINS (for herself, Mr. HATCH, and Mr. QUAYLE):

S. 2324. A bill to reauthorize programs under the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

DOMESTIC VOLUNTEER SERVICE ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation that will reauthorize an agency that is in the forefront of tapping the vast resources of our Nation's volunteers.

ACTION is the Federal agency charged with the mission of fostering and expanding voluntary citizen service and public and private organizations in solving vital problems confronting the poor, the disabled, the elderly and young with special needs. The most widely known of ACTION's programs are VISTA, Volunteers in Service to America, and the Foster Grandparent Program.

Since its inception in 1973, more than 80,000 VISTA volunteers have aided in the solution of poverty-related problems through helping low-income individuals achieve self-sufficiency through meaningful and constructive volunteer service. In Florida, VISTA volunteers work in food banks, with drug abuse prevention programs, and with child abuse programs. In the early part of this decade, in the midst of the Marielito boat lift, VISTA volunteers provided invaluable assistance to Cuban and Haitian refugees by soliciting donations, placing refugees in jobs, attracting community volunteers and producing a Creole-English handbook for Haitian refugees.

VISTA's programming efforts have focused on the problems of hunger, homelessness, illiteracy, unemployment, drug and alcohol abuse, domestic violence, child abuse, the special needs of low-income seniors, the handicapped, migrant farm workers, and native Americans.

Foster Grandparents are low-income seniors who serve 20 hours per week working with children who have mental, physical, and emotional handicaps. Daisy Martin, a foster grandparent from Fort Lauderdale, FL testified before my Subcommittee on Children, Family, Drugs, and Alcoholism in behalf of the reauthorization of this program. Mrs. Martin spoke for all foster grandparents when she described the special importance that this program serves in her life.

> We like to be useful. We like to feel needed. We like to go out and share our love with humans, mankind. And that is the total source of the Foster Grandparent program—helping themselves and helping others to help themselves. We have Foster Grandparents working in child abuse shelters, drug abuse shelters, daycare nurseries, and women in distress shelters. We have Foster Grandparents working in all those shelters, giving themselves and giving their time and their love, sharing their love and their time and their energy with mankind.

Senior Companion and Retired Senior Volunteer Program [RSVP] are the other two older American volunteer programs. While they are perhaps not as well known as the Foster Grandparent Program, they provide equally important services to those in need. Senior Companions are also low-income individuals who serve 20 hours a week providing assistance to elderly persons in order to prevent or delay their institutionalization. Senior Companions play a crucial role in assisting the frail elderly to overcome mental, emotional, and physical impairments to achieve their fullest potential, to maintain their health and independence.

Retired Senior Volunteers are composed of elderly volunteers from all income levels who serve without stipend to address a variety of community needs such as youth services, literacy enhancement, in-home care, crime prevention, housing rehabilitation, as well as offering their years of vast experience to nonprofit service organizations to improve the organization's management and operational practices.

Other ACTION volunteer programs include the Service Learning Program, whose purpose is to link the needs of the poor with the students interest in community service, citizen participation and volunteer demonstration programs which are designed to mobilize citizens for voluntary action to change the conditions that deny fulfillment of human potential and to demonstrate and replicate innovative volunteer efforts.

Testimony presented to my Subcommittee on Children, Family, Drugs and Alcoholism on February 6 clearly demonstrated the worth and value of the Federal funds expended to foster these volunteer activities. Therefore, today I am introducing legislation to reauthorize this program for an additional 3 years at a level of authorized appropriations which will permit this program to expend its efforts to reach those in need.

I am recommending authorization of appropriations for fiscal year 1987 at or near the level of authorized for the previous fiscal year. In most cases this is close to the appropriated levels. The two exceptions are VISTA and Senior Companion Program which have never been appropriated at their full authorized levels, I believe that programs are cost-effective methods of reducing poverty and assisting our frail elderly. I hope that the Budget and Appropriations Committee will consider funding all of the ACTION programs at their authorized levels.

The modifications contained in this reauthorization legislation are designed to improve the agencies ability to foster and expand voluntary citizen service, utilizing public and private sector resources and coordinate this effort with other Federal agencies.

The provisions include a statement of volunteerism policy which is intended to tie together the specific statements of purpose for individual programs already contained in the act and create a general mission statement. This volunteerism policy reiterates ACTION's goal of stimulating the tremendous potential of Americans to volunteer and the agency's role in directing these volunteer efforts to activities designed to serve the poor, the disadvantaged and the vulnerable.

The reauthorization legislation contains several modifications designed to enhance the ability of ACTION to utilize the generosity and resources of public and private sector resources.

The National Voluntary Service Advisory Council is reestablished, with a mandate for a smaller more manageable membership, the Director's authority to accept and distribute private sector contributions is expanded to specifically authorize the Director to conduct fundraising in behalf of ACTION programs.

In addition, the Director is authorized to develop regulations to provide an opportunity for senior citizens who are anxious to volunteer, but are currently ineligible to become foster grandparents or senior companions because of their incomes. Provisions in the reauthorization legislation would permit the enrollment of elderly volunteers who don't meet the income eligibility standards, but only if they serve without stipend, do not utilize federal financial resources meant for low-income stipended volunteers and under no circumstances substitute or supplant the low income stipend volunteer.

Mr. President, this legislation was developed with the cooperation and input of other members of the Subcommittee on Children, Family, Drugs and Alcoholism. It is my understanding that some of my colleagues on the full Committee have proposals that they wish considered. Senator SIMON in particular has informed me of his desire to expand VISTA's literacy initiatives and Senator METZENBAUM has indicated his interest in the subject of the National Voluntary Service Advisory Council. I plan to consider this legislative proposal at the full committee.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the reauthorization legislation and a section-by-section analysis of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2324

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Domestic Volunteer Service Act Amendments of 1986".

VOLUNTEERISM POLICY

SEC. 2. (a) The Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Act") is amended by inserting immediately after the table of contents the following new section:

"VOLUNTEERISM POLICY

"SEC. 2. (a) Because of the long-standing importance of volunteerism throughout American history, it is the policy of the Congress to foster the tradition of volunteerism through greater involvement on the part of both young and older citizens.

"(b) It is the intention of the Congress, through ACTION, the Federal domestic volunteer agency, to foster and expand voluntary citizen service, and coordinate its efforts with other Federal agencies. The ACTION Agency shall utilize to the fullest extent the energy, innovative spirit, experience, and skills of all Americans to serve local communities designed to help the poor, the disadvantaged, and the vulnerable through the application of volunteer service.".

(b) The table of contents of the Act is amended by inserting before title I the following new item:

"Sec. 2. Volunteerism policy.".

FOSTER GRANDPARENT PROGRAMS

SEC. 3. Section 211 of the Act is amended by redesignating subsection (e) as subsection (f) and by inserting after subsection (d) the following new subsection:

"(e)(1) Pursuant to regulations which the Director may prescribe, individuals may serve as foster grandparents under this part who are not low-income persons if the individuals serve without stipend or reimbursement for expenses other than transportation, meals, and out-of-pocket expenses incident to the provision of services under this part.

"(2)(A) Each nonstipend volunteer shall comply with requirements of this part, including the 20-hour-per-week service schedule.

"(B) No appropriated funds may be diverted from direct volunteer benefits for low-income stipend volunteers to direct volunteer benefits for nonstipend volunteers under this part.

"(C) Volunteers not in the low-income category serving without stipend under this part shall not replace low-income volunteers serving with stipend.".

SENIOR COMPANION PROGRAM

SEC. 4. Section 213 of the Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d)(1) Pursuant to regulations which the Director may prescribe, individuals may serve as senior companions under this part who are not low-income persons if such individuals serve without stipend or reimbursement of expenses other than for transportation, meals, and out-of-pocket expenses incident to the provision of services under this part.

"(2)(A) Each nonstipend volunteer shall comply with requirements of this part, including the 20-hour-per-week service schedule.

"(B) No appropriated funds may be diverted from direct volunteer benefits for low-income stipend volunteers to direct volunteer benefits for nonstipend volunteers under this part.

"(C) Volunteers not in the low-income category serving without stipend under this part shall not replace low-income volunteers serving with stipend.".

AUTHORITY OF THE DIRECTOR

SEC. 5. Section 402 of the Act is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)" after the section designation; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(b)(1) The Director is authorized to accept in the name of the ACTION Agency funds received through solicitation of profit and nonprofit entities and to employ or dispose of the funds in furtherance of the purposes of this Act, or of any title thereof. Consistent with the provisions of clause (5) of subsection (a) of this section, all funds so received shall become part of the gift fund account of the ACTION Agency and shall remain available until expended.

"(2) The Director shall assure that a majority of the aggregate amount in each fiscal year of all unrestricted gifts to the ACTION Agency will be spent to support volunteer projects carried out at the community level.".

ADMINISTRATION AND COORDINATION; ADVISORY COUNCIL

SEC. 6. (a) Title IV of the Act is amended by inserting after section 404 the following new section:

"NATIONAL VOLUNTARY SERVICE ADVISORY COUNCIL

"SEC. 405. (a) There is hereby established in the ACTION Agency a National Voluntary Service Advisory Council (hereinafter referred to as the 'Council') to be composed of not more than 25 members appointed, not later than ninety days after the date of the enactment of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act Amendments of 1986, by and serving at the pleasure of the President. Such members shall be representative of public and private organizations, groups and individuals interested in serving programs and benefited by programs carried out under this Act. The President shall designate a temporary chairperson from such members and shall call the initial meeting of the Council within thirty days after appointment of such Council. Members of the Council shall designate a permanent chairperson from such members and shall meet at the call of such chairperson. The Director and Deputy Director of the ACTION Agency shall be ex officio members of the Council.

"(b) The Council shall—

"(1) advise the Director with respect to policy matters arising in the administration of this Act; and

"(2) upon the request of the Director, review and effectiveness and the operation of programs under this Act and make recommendations (including such proposals for changes in this Act as the Council deems appropriate) concerning (A) the improvement of such programs, (B) the elimination of duplication of effort, and (C) the coordination of such programs with other Federal programs designed to assist the beneficiaries of this Act.

"(c) Members of the Council, other than individuals regularly employed by the Federal Government shall, while away from their homes or regular places of business, be paid travel expenses (including per diem in lieu of subsistance) as authorized by section 5703 of title 5, United States Code, for persons in the Government service employed intermittently.

"(d) Not later than January 1 of each calendar year, the Council shall make an annual report of its findings and recommendations to the President for transmittal by the President to the Congress, together with his comments and recommendations.".

(b) Title IV of the table of contents of the Act is amended by inserting after item "Sec. 404." the following new item:

"Sec. 405. National Voluntary Service Advisory Council.".

EVALUATION

SEC. 7. Section 416(a) of the Act is amended to read as follows:

"(a) The Director shall measure and evaluate the impact of all programs authorized by this Act, their effectiveness in achieving stated goals, in general, and in relation to their cost, their impact on related programs, and their structure and mechanism for delivery of services. Each program shall be evaluated at least once every four years. Evaluations shall be conducted by persons not immediately involved in the administration of the program or project evaluated.".

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE DOMESTIC VOLUNTEER SERVICE ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986

Section 1 of the bill cites the Act as the "Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1986."

Section 2 of the bill adds a new section immediately after the table of contents stating that the policy of the Congress is to foster the tradition of volunteerism through greater involvement of both young and elder citizens. The section also states that it is the intention of Congress, through the ACTION agency to foster and expand voluntary citizen services and coordinate efforts within other Federal agencies. ACTION is required to utilize the energy, innovative spirit, experience, and skills of all Americans to serve local communities in activities designed to help the poor, disadvantaged, and vulnerable through volunteer service.

Section 3 of the bill amends section 211 of the Act regarding the foster grandparent program to add a new subsection authorizing the Director to develop regulations permitting the enrollment of individuals who do not meet the low-income criteria if such individuals are willing to serve without a stipend or reimbursement for expenses other than for transportation, meals, and out-of-pocket expenses incident to providing foster grandparent services. Non-stipend volunteers must work 20 hours a week and comply with other foster grandparent requirements. The section further prohibits appropriated funds from being diverted from direct volunteer benefits for low-income stipend volunteers to non-stipend volunteers. It also prohibits non-stipend volunteers from replacing low-income volunteers serving with stipend.

Section 4 of the bill amends section 213 of the Act regarding the Senior Companion program by adding a new subsection authorizing the Director to develop regulations permitting the enrollment of volunteers who do not meet the low-income criteria if such volunteers are willing to serve without stipend or reimbursement for expenses other than for transportation, meals, or out-of-pocket expenses incident to providing senior companion services. Non-stipend volunteers must work 20 hours a week and comply with other senior companion requirements. The section further prohibits appropriated funds from being diverted from direct volunteer benefits for low-income stipend volunteers to non-stipend volunteers serving without stipend.

Section 5 of the bill amends section 402 of the Act to add a new subsection regarding authorized duties of the Director. It authorizes the Director to accept solicited funds from profit and non-profit entities, and to use the funds in accordance with the purposes and the activities authorized by the Act. The bill requires, consistent with section 402(5) of the Act, that all funds shall become part of the gift fund account of ACTION and shall remain available until expended. The subsection also requires the Director to assure that a majority of the amount of all unrestricted gifts to ACTION each fiscal year will be spent to support volunteer projects at the community level.

Section 6 of the bill amends Title IV of the Act by inserting a new section 405 to establish a National Voluntary Service Advisory Council. The Council is to be composed of not more than twelve members appointed by and serving at the pleasure of the President, and appointed no later than 90 days after enactment of this bill. The members are to be representative of public and private organizations, and groups and individuals interested in serving programs and benefited by programs carried out under this Act. Designation of chairpersons, ex-officio members, and the initial meeting date are also set forth. The Council shall advise the Director on policy matters arising in the administration of the Act. Upon the request of the Director, the Council shall review the effectiveness and the operation of programs under the Act and make recommendations concerning the improvement of such programs, the elimination of duplication of effort, and the coordination of such program with other Federal programs designed to assist the beneficiaries of this Act. Council members, other than Federal employees, are to have their travel and per diem expenses reimbursed for the time they serve on the Council. The Council shall make annual reports of its fundings and recommendations by January 1st of each year. The reports are to be sent to the President who is required to send them to Congress with his comments and recommendations.

Section 7 of the bill restates and also amends part of section 416(a) of the Act regarding evaluations. It specifies that the Director shall measure and evaluate the impact of all programs authorized by this Act in terms of their effectiveness in achieving stated goals, and in relation to their cost, their impact on related programs, and their structure and mechanism for delivery of services. Each program shall be evaluated at least once every four years. Evaluations shall be conducted by persons not immediately involved in the administration of the program or project evaluated.

Section 8 of the bill amends section 501(a) of the Act to authorize the following appropriations for fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989:

	Fiscal year—
	1987	1988	1989
Volunteers in Service to America (VISTA)	$25,000,000	$25,750,000	$26,522,500
Service-learning programs	1,800,000	1,800,000	1,800,000
Special volunteer projects	1,984,000	1,984,000	1,984,000

Section 9 of the bill amends section 502(a) of the Act to authorize the following appropriations for fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989:

	Fiscal year—
	1987	1988	1989
Retired Senior Volunteer Program	$31,100,000	$32,033,000	$32,990,000
Foster Grandparent Program	58,700,000	60,461,000	62,274,830
Senior Companion Program	28,600,000	29,458,000	30,341,740

Section 10 of the bill amends section 504 of the Act to authorize for title IV program administration $25,312,000 for each of fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989.

Section 11 of the bill makes various technical amendments, including the following. Section 11(b) corrects an amendment in the "domestic Volunteer Service Act Amendments of 1984" which refers to "Part C" instead of "Part D, General Provisions."

Section 11(c) changes the heading for section 213 of the Act (containing provisions for the Senior Companion Program) to "Grants and Contracts for Volunteer Service Projects." This subsection also makes the change in the Table of Contents.

The remaining subsections eliminate references to the gender of the Director of the ACTION agency, or make punctuation changes in the Act.

By Mr. EXON:

S. 2325. A bill to permit a maximum speed limit of 70 miles per hour on any route within the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

SEVENTY-MILE-PER-HOUR SPEED LIMIT

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation which will give the States the authority to increase the maximum speed on interstate highways to 70 miles per hour.

It is very important to note that this bill applies to the Interstate Highway System only. This legislation in no way will allow States to increase the speed limits on primary or secondary roadways over the current limit of 55 miles per hour.

It has become increasingly apparent that the motoring public is systemically ignoring the current national requirement of a 55-miles-per-hour maximum on the interstate.

When this law was enacted in 1974, it was done so in response to an energy crisis. Today, we have a different situation. If we subsequently encounter energy shortage problems we may have to cut back again as a result of falling energy costs, our motorists, on the whole, are ignoring the 55-miles-per-hour limit on the Interstate System as are most of the enforcement agencies. This is especially true in States, like Nebraska, which have large sparsely populated geographical areas of limited congestion. In addition, State enforcement of the 55-miles-per-hour limit on the Interstate System is lax. I need only cite Nebraska's law regarding interstate speed in which one can drive up to 65 miles per hour and, if ticketed, will only pay a maximum fine of $10 and lose no points off of one's driver license. As a result of this law, enforcement of 55 miles per hour on the interstate actually begins at 65 miles per hour. I know that other States also are experiencing lax enforcement of the 55-mile-per-hour speed similar to that in Nebraska.

Mr. President, a recent review of Nebraska's accident statistics show that of the 207 fatal accidents which occurred in Nebraska in 1985, only 7 took place on the Interstate System. That is only 3.4 percent. It is also interesting to note that not one of these seven fatal accidents cited excessive speed as the cause.

Nationally, of the 39,622 fatal accidents occurring during 1984, only 3,749 or 9.4 percent occurred on the Nation's Interstate System. While contributing factor statistics are not available on these accidents obtained from the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. I would not hesitate to assume that the large majority of these accidents were also caused by factors other than excessive speeds.

Mr. President, I want to stress that this legislation will only apply to the Interstate System. In addition, the States will continue to have broad authority to set lower speed limits on any portion of or all of an interstate they believe unsuitable for a 70-mile-per-hour maximum. The States set whatever limit they want under 70-mile-per-hour maximum.

Finally, during my years as Governor of Nebraska I was deeply involved in highway safety and established a sound record. I do not believe the measure I am introducing today is contrary to or inconsistent with that record.

Mr. President, I have always believed that an unenforceable law is a bad law. I truly believe this applies to the 55-mile-per-hour speed limit on our Nation's Interstate Highway System under today's circumstances.

During the 1980 President campaign, President Reagan expressed his opposition to the current 55-mile-per-hour speed limit. Knowing of his feelings on this matter, I have written the President requesting his support for this legislation. In my letter, I requested suggestions for any improvements or amendments which he may require for his support. I ask unanimous consent that the bill and a copy of my letter to President Reagan be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2325

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 154 of title 23, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(i) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the maximum speed limit permitted on any route within the Interstate System shall be seventy miles per hour.".

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, DC, April 17, 1986.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Public compliance with the current federal law regarding the 55 mph speed limit on our nation's highways has been decreasing steadily since its enactment during the energy crisis in 1974. This is particularly true on our interstate system which was designed for higher speeds without compromising safety.

Today, more and more of our nation's motorists are traveling on our interstate system at speeds considerably over the 55 mph limit. They do so with full knowledge of the law but also with full knowledge that the enforcement of this limit has also become increasingly lax.

During the 1980 presidential campaign, you opposed the 55 mph speed limit. The 1980 Republican Platform, which you also embraced, stated; "We believe the federal 55 mile per hour speed limit is counterproductive and contributes to higher costs of goods and services to all communities, particularly in rural America. The most effective, no-cost federal assistance program available would be for each state to set its own speed limit."

I have introduced legislation which would follow exactly your stated opinion and allow states to set the speed limit on their interstate systems up to a top limit of 70 mph. This bill will not change the current maximum federal speed limit on primary and secondary highways nor will it change the states' authority to set lower limits on certain segments of interstate highway not suitable for the 70 mph limit.

Mr. President, I believe this legislation is a positive step toward giving the states more flexibility in setting speed limits on their interstate systems without compromising the overall issue of safety. I also believe this legislation is consistent with your philosophy on this matter. I would, therefore, ask for your support of this legislation.

If there are any adjustments that you believe may improve this legislation, I would be pleased to consider any amendment you believe would be required for your support.

Sincerely,

J. JAMES EXON,
U.S. Senator.

By Mr. HEFLIN:

S. 2326. A bill to protect the name and marks of the Alabama Space Science Exhibit Commission; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ALABAMA SPACE SCIENCE EXHIBIT COMMISSION

● Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in 1965 the Alabama Legislature established the Alabama Space Science Exhibit Commission as a nonprofit educational agency to operate a space and rocket museum in Huntsville, AL. In 1982, this commission began the Youth Camp Science Program in Huntsville to stimulate young people's interest in space, science, and math through extensive hands-on experience with the space program. The huge success of the space camp program has been the subject of numerous articles in national magazines and newspapers as well as network news programs.

Space camp is the only supplemental educational program in the Nation specifically intended to motivate youngsters to prepare for high technology and scientific careers. The space camp program influences its young participants to study science and technology so they will be adequately qualified to become the scientists and engineers of tomorrow.

The youngsters, ranging from ages 11 t0 16, spend 5 days at the Space and Rocket Center's museum complex in closely structured programs involving rocketry, equipment design, astronaut training, computers and career guidance. They work with sophisticated equipment and converse with engineers and scientists involved in aerospace technology. Children from varied ethic and social backgrounds work side-by-side each day.

At the request of the program's graduates for continuing studies between trips to Huntsville, a package of home study material is being developed for distribution by its Space Camp Club. Also, youngsters' education will be carried to higher levels with the creation of the Space Academy Science Program.

This season, some 4,000 boys and girls from all 50 States and at least 18 foreign countries will participate in this remarkable educational program. This will raise the 5-year total to more than 12,000 participants.

Inspired by the late Dr. Wernher von Braun, the space camp is self-supported and depends on its funding from a number of sources including the Huntsville, AL aerospace community, the U.S. Army Missile Command, and the Marshall Space Flight Center of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. Just as Dr. Von Braun founded the Space and Rocket Museum on a self-funded basis, so have the educational programs continued on that philosophy.

Financial support from the Nation's high technology industry is growing each year. Funds for construction of permanent facilities are being raised from a number of leading corporations. Among them are Coca-Cola, McDonnell Douglas, Rockwell International, Morton Thiokol, IBM, Teledyne, Eastern Airlines, United Technologies, Lockheed, Boeing, Texas Instruments, Essex Corp., Controlled Data Corp., TRW, South Central Bell, Martin Marietta, Goldstar, Owens-Corning, Raytheon, PPG Industries, Polaroid, Chesebrough Ponds, 3M, First Alabama Bank, J.T. Schrimsher Co., Hercules, Wyle, Proctor and Gamble, Atlanta Research, Colonial Bank of North Alabama, GTE, Bendix, and Finalco.

In my many trips to the Space and Rocket Museum I have been impressed with the enthusiasm and interest demonstrated by the fine young people that participate in this program as well as its highly qualified staff. I firmly believe that this young generation being trained to staff our aerospace and other high tech programs in the 21st century will be able to accomplish even greater successes than we have to date.

Today I am introducing legislation which would protect the use of the official names which have been created by the Alabama Space Science Exhibit Commission. Through its unique and excellent educational programs the space camp is now recognized the world over. My bill would simply give the Commission the exclusive rights to the continued use of the names it created, such as space camp and space academy, and which have become synonymous with these programs. I urge my colleagues to support me in this effort.●

By Mr. EVANS (for himself, Mr. GORE, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. FORD, Mr. GORTON, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. SASSER, and Mr. ZORINSKY):

S. 2328. A bill to prohibit for a ten-year period the transfer or sale of Federal Power Marketing Administrations or the Tennessee Valley Authority, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

(The remarks of Mr. EVANS and others, and the text of the legislation appear earlier in today's RECORD.)

By Mr. COCHRAN:

S. 2330. A bill to amend the copyright law regarding work made for hire; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TO AMEND THE COPYRIGHT LAW REGARDING WORK FOR HIRE

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to amend the copyright laws to protect more effectively the work product of writers, artists, photographers, composers, and other such creators of works of art.

During the 97th and 98th Congresses, I introduced similar legislation after learning that some artists in my State of Mississippi had found themselves to be the victims of work-for-hire laws that were unfair to them.

The Senate Judiciary Committee held hearings in 1982 to review this legislation and to examine industry practices. Representatives of the Graphic Artists Guild, the Authors League of America, and the American Society of Journalists and Authors testified, as did representatives of the publishing industry.

Since that time, I have continued to work with members of the Graphic Artists Guild, the American Society of Magazine Photographers, and others to develop a better proposal for consideration by the Congress. Supporting the reform effort is a coalition of over 40 artist and writer groups representing more than 40,000 creators. I ask unanimous consent that a list of those organizations be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Under present law, a work may be deemed a work made for hire if it is first, a work prepared by an employee within the scope of his or her employment; or second, a certain type of work specially commissioned if the parties expressly agree in a written instrument signed by them that the work will be considered a work made for hire. Specially commissioned works are limited to those enumerated in the definition which includes contributions to collective works, parts of motion pictures and audiovisuals, instructional texts, and others.

If a creator prepares a work made for hire, he or she is no longer the author for copyright purposes; rather, the employer or the commissioning party is the author and receives all future income that may be derived from any use of the work in any medium.

This presents less of a problem for employees who may lose authorship of their work but are deemed to be rewarded by the terms of their employment, which may include a salary and fringe benefits, or provision of a workplace, and tools and materials.

Freelance creators enjoy none of the security and benefits associated with employee status, are compensated only for the intended use of the copyrighted work, and are further cut off from any other income generated by the subsequent use of their work. Because publishes enjoy a superior bargaining position, they are able to demand a work-for-hire contract as a condition of publication.

The theory of the work-for-hire doctrine is that the employer or commissioning party is entitled to authorship of the work because he conceives, directs, and controls the production of the work and bears the financial risks of development. While this argument is a strong one for works prepared by an employee in the course of his employment, it is not always applicable to freelancers who often conceive and develop a work in their own studios.

Yet, artists, writers, and others complain that work-for-hire contracts are forced upon them even when the publisher exercises little or no control over the production of the work. And, in many instances, work-for-hire agreements are demanded after a work has already been created, sometimes by use of a restrictive endorsement on a payment check, a practice clearly outside the intent of the work-for-hire laws.

Conflicting court decisions have also undermined the clear intent of Congress that commissioned work be considered work-for-hire only if a written contract so provides. In Aldon Accessories v. Spiegel Ltd., 738 F. 2nd 548 (2nd Cir.), cert. denied, 105 S. Ct. 387 (1984), the Second Circuit Court of Appeals used a "control and supervision" test in finding that freelance artists working on commission are employees under the work-for-hire definition.

The legislation I am introducing attempts to address these inequities. Under my bill, the copyright law's definition of employee is changed to exclude freelancers. The bill deletes from current law all types of works which may be subject to work-for-hire contracts, except motion pictures. Most categories of works would be subject to standard all rights contracts.

Other categories, including contributions to collective works, parts of audiovisuals, other than motion pictures, supplementary works, and instructional texts, would be subject to the section of the copyright law providing for the transfer of limited rights to reproduce or distribute an author's work. Rights which are granted but are not exercised within 3 years would be subject to termination by the artist.

In order to close another potential loophole in the work-for-hire laws, the bill clarifies the definition of joint work by requiring that, for a specially ordered or commissioned work to be considered a joint work, the parties must expressly so agree in a written instrument prior to commencement of the work.

Additionally, the bill provides that ownership of original art is deemed to remain with the creator unless transferred by a written instrument. Aside from the value of copyright, a photograph, illustration, manuscript, or other creation may be valuable in itself and may represent another source of income for its creator.

Mr. President, there is considerable support throughout the country for Congress to address the rights of artists and the inequities of work-for-hire. The States of New York and California have enacted moral rights legislation, designed to prohibit the alteration or mutilation of artwork and to recognize the artist's interest in his work after its sale. Fair practices legislation enacted in New York, California, and Oregon involves the transfer of ownership in the physical object, and, like my bill, requires a written instrument to effect such a transfer.

The State of California has also enacted work-for-hire legislation that entitles a creator working under a work-for-hire agreement to employee benefits.

Despite the States attempts to deal with the problem, the Federal copyright law is preemptive. True reform requires Federal legislation. Resolutions adopted by the New York City Council and the Detroit and Providence, RI, city councils have called upon the U.S. Congress to take action on the issue.

Mr. President, our copyright laws were enacted to promote and protect the creation of literary, artistic, musical and other works. Yet, our work-for-hire laws are depriving all artists, not only the new, young creators, of much of the income generated by their work. In many cases, they are being forced to abandon their careers.

I hope my friends on the Judiciary Committee will give prompt consideration to this bill and recommend its passage to the Senate at an early date.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2330

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 101 of title 17, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by amending the definition of "work made for hire"—

(A) in clause (1) by inserting before the semicolon the following: "if the employee receives all employment benefits due under applicable State and Federal law and the employer withholds taxes from such payments to the employee and remits such taxes to the Internal Revenue Service";

(B) by amending clause (2) to read as follows:

"(2) a work specially ordered or commissioned for use as a part of a motion picture, if for each such work the parties expressly agree in a separate written instrument signed by them prior to the commencement of any work pursuant to such an order or commission that the work shall be considered a work made for hire."; and

(C) by adding at the end thereof the following: "Unless the work falls within either clause (1) or clause (2), it cannot be work made for hire.";

(2) by adding at the end of the definition of "joint work" the following: "For a specially ordered or commissioned work to be a joint work, the work must meet the foregoing definition and for each such work the parties must expressly agree in a separate written instrument signed by them prior to the commencement of any work that the work shall be considered a joint work.".

SEC. 2. Section 201 of title 17, United States Code, is amended by amending subsection (c) to read as follows:

"(c) CONTRIBUTIONS TO COLLECTIVE WORKS, CONTRIBUTIONS TO COMPILATIONS, SUPPLEMENTARY WORKS, INSTRUCTIONAL TEXTS, AND PARTS OF AUDIOVISUAL WORKS OTHER THAN MOTION PICTURES.—Copyright in each separate contribution to a collective work, in any supplementary work, in any instructional text, and in any part of an audiovisual work other than a motion picture, is distinct from the copyright in the larger or revised work as a whole, and vests initially with the author who created the work which is to be incorporated into the larger or revised work. In the absence of an express transfer of the copyright or of any rights under it, the owner of the copyright in such larger or revised work is pressure to have acquired only the privilege of reproducing and distributing the author's work as part of such particular larger or revised work, any revision of such larger or revised work, and any later larger or revised work in the same series. If an express transfer is made with respect to an author's work in one of these categories, such transfer shall not exceed the rights which the transferee reasonably anticipates exercising. For purposes of this subsection—

"(1) an 'instructional text' means a literary, pictorial, or graphic work prepared for publication and with the purpose of use in systematic instructional activities; and

"(2) a 'supplementary work' is a work prepared for publication as a secondary adjunct to a work by another author for the purpose of introducing, concluding, illustrating, explaining, revising, commenting upon, or assisting in the use of the other work, such as forwards, afterwords, pictorial illustrations, or appendixes.".

SEC. 3. Section 202 of title 17, United States Code, is amended by striking out all after the semicolon in the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "nor, in the absence of a written agreement expressly conveying property rights in a material object, does transfer of ownership of a copyright or of any exclusive rights under a copyright or the entering into a work made for hire definition convey property rights in any material object.".

SEC. 4. Section 203 of title 17, United States Code, is amended by inserting at the end of subsection (a)(3) the following: "As to categories of works covered by section 201(c), a partial termination may be effected at any time during a period of five years beginning at the end of the period of three years after the date of the execution of the grant. The termination shall apply to any usage permitted under the grant which has not been exercised by publication, except that any title published within such three-year period may be republished in its original form or in a revised version of that particular title. For purposes of the foregoing sentence, a title shall be deemed revised if in its new form two-thirds of the content is retained from the original version. Neither the effectuation of such a partial termination nor the failure to effect such a partial termination shall in any way restrict the effectuation of a complete termination of any grant pursuant to this clause.".

S. 2331. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to assure the quality of inpatient hospital services and posthospital services furnished under the Medicare Program, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

MEDICARE QUALITY PROTECTION ACT

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today I am introducing along with my colleagues, Senators GLENN, DURENBERGER, KENNEDY, BRADLEY, CHAFEE, MATSUNAGA, CHILES, WILSON, RIEGLE, MOYNIHAN, and DODD, the Medicare Quality Protection Act of 1986, to improve quality and access to care under the Medicare Program. I am extremely pleased that Representative PETE STARK, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee's Subcommittee on Health, and Representative BILL GRADISON, the ranking minority member, are introducing the identical bill today in the House. They are joined by the chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee Subcommittee on Health and the Environment, Representative WAXMAN, and Representatives ROYBAL, RINALDO, PEPPER, and REGULA.

The legislation I am introducing today is aimed largely at improving quality in hospital and posthospital settings and ensuring greater access to posthospital services. Shortly, I will be introducing a second bill which will focus on quality of care and patients' rights in nursing homes.

The Medicare Quality Protection Act responds to the many problems uncovered during the Senate Aging Committee's yearlong investigation into quality of care under Medicare's prospective payment system [PPS]. The bill does not seek to dismantle PPS; nor does it impose a new layer of redtape and burdensome regulation on providers. On the contrary, it darns holes and repairs flaws in existing Medicare and Medicaid laws, strengthening quality and access to care while continuing to provide for effective Medicare cost containment.

WHY IS THE MEDICARE QUALITY PROTECTION ACT NECESSARY?

In 1983, Congress acted to save a financially strapped Medicare Program with the prospective payment system. We had confidence that this new reimbursement method could halt spiralling hospital costs and restore solvency. The good news is that our confidence has been rewarded. Hospital costs in 1985 increased by only 6 percent—the lowest rate of increase in the past 20 years.

But Congress also recognized that PPS contained certain inherent incentives to cut back on the level and quality of care provided patients. So Congress charged the peer review organizations with the responsibility of monitoring for quality and sanctioning those providers who would place high profits above good medical practice.

The bad news is that within 1 year of implementation, many physicians and consumers expressed concern that PPS did indeed pose a serious threat to quality of care for Medicare beneficiaries, and might be eroding access to care for the sickest and oldest beneficiaries.

In early December 1984, the American Medical Association published the results of an informal survey of its members. A large majority of those responding said quality of care had already deteriorated, or would deteriorate as a result of PPS. Hospital administrators were reportedly pressuring doctors to violate their own medical judgment in treating patients by discharging patients for a primary conditon and readmitting them for a second, releasing patients prematurely, and taking a more critical look at tests and procedures they ordered.

This AMA study sketched only the basic outlines of what has become a widespread national dilemma of care.

In February 1985, the General Accounting Office released preliminary findings of a study it was conducting at my request on the impact of PPS on posthospital care. Summarizing testimony from hospital, nursing home, and home health agency representatives from six communities around the Nation, the GAO concluded patients were being discharged from hospitals "sicker and quicker" than before PPS and that in too many cases, were being discharged to inappropriate levels of care or no care at all. These findings were echoed in a joint hearing of the House Select Committee on Aging and the Task Force on Rural Elderly on February 26, 1985.

From the beginning, the administration, through the Health Care Financing Administration, chose to deny any deep flaws in the DRG system. I quote from HCFA Administrator Carolyne Davis' own testimony before Congress that "while there have been isolated instances of premature discharge and inappropriate transfer, there has been no evidence of systemic abuse." HCFA argued that the watchdogs of quality, the PRO's, were doing their jobs and that no major problems were developing.

As the agency with administrative and rulemaking responsibility for Medicare, HCFA is critical to the success or failure of the PRO program, the collection of data on quality and access under PPS and the overall operation of prospective reimbursement. But despite well-documented evidence of program abuse, HCFA repeatedly referred to "anecdotal episodes" and failed to make necessary reforms.

In February 1985, the Senate Special Committee on Aging launched its own investigation into quality of care under PPS. Committee staff visited and collected data from five peer review organizations, and several community and university hospitals. The inquiry involved scores of interviews with Medicare beneficiaries, practicing physicians and nurses, university researchers, personnel from the Health Care Financing Administration, and the Department of Health and Human Services Office of Inspector General. In addition, committee staff gathered and analyzed volumes of records obtained from these organizations and individuals.

The committee's investigation led to three hearings in the fall of 1985: September 26, October 24, and November 12. The committee looked at quality of care issues in hospital and posthospital settings and heard witnesses from 14 States detail a large variety of problems with quality and access. We also heard from a wide-ranging set of experts on ways to respond to the various problems developing under PPS.

The committee found that quality of care problems are widespread. Our most disturbing evidence showed:

Hospitals are pressuring doctors to keep ill people out of the hospital and to discharge others in an unstable condition;

Patients and their families often receive false and incomplete information regarding their rights under the new payment system;

PRO's have only a snapshot picture of quality and feel hamstrung by a "restrictive, underfunded, inflexible, and narrowly focused" review program; and

Too often, patients are discharged to an inappropriate setting for followup care.

The Aging Committee's findings have since been reinforced by the Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services. In a new study of premature discharges and inappropriate transfers, Inspector General Richard Kusserow found substantial evidence of premature discharges and inappropriate transfers. He also found that the PRO's had not been effectively using their enforcement powers to address instances of poor quality care. During the period reviewed, October 1, 1983 through May 5, 1985, 14 of the PRO's studied were not reporting premature discharges or inappropriate transfers. The IG concluded that, "therefore, the overall extent of the problem is still not fully known." Quality issues ranged from minor to gross and flagrant violations. Further, Mr. Kusserow placed blame for this problem on the doorstep of HCFA for failing to give clear and consistent guidance to the PRO's as to their quality assurance responsibilities.

The quality abuses documented under the DRG system cannot be halted without a comprehensive strategy for reform. We in the Congress have but one priority in this effort: To restore public confidence in the system and assure quality health care. The Medicare Quality Protection Act is designed with this priority in mind.

The Congressional Budget Office has put a preliminary price tag of $200 million over 3 years on this legislation. Over that same time period we're likely to spend over $200 billion on the Medicare Program. Especially since the prospective payment system is saving the Medicare Program between $3 billion and $4 billion every year, we think less than $70 million a year is a small price to pay for protecting the quality of care under that system.

We introduce the Medicare Quality Protection Act today with the full support of the American Association of Retired Persons, the American Society of Internal Medicine, the National Association of Home Care, the National Council of Senior Citizens, and the American Nurses Association.

A summary of the major findings of the committee and the key provisions of the Medicare Quality Protection Act follow:

I. PROTECTING QUALITY IN ACUTE CARE SETTINGS

(1) Refining the DRGs: Under PPS, patients deemed "DRG losers" by doctors and hospitals—patients with multiple serious conditions—are being prematurely discharged, inappropriately transferred, or refused admission for care. The problem is that DRGs reimburse based on average cost for a principle diagnosis, with no flexibility in payment to account for so-called differences in "severity of illness" among patients with the same diagnosis. Such an inequitable standard for payemnt encourages treatment of the straightforward case and the younger patient over treatment of the heavy care and older patient.

The Heinz-Stark bill requires HHS by January 1, 1988, to develop a PPS patient classification system that reflects variations in severity of illness and case complexity among patients within each diagnosis related group (DRG). HHS would also be required to consider possible changes in outlier policy as an alternative method of accounting for variations in severity and complexity.

2. Inadequate Rights of Appeal: The Aging Committee's investigation revealed that many patients who may wish to present evidence of substandard care or challenge a hospital discharge decision are unaware of their right of appeal, or are given false or incomplete information regarding this right. ProPAC also identified this as a problem in its 1986 Report to HHS and Congress.

At a hearing last fall of the Committee, one witness spoke of the anguish of having to watch her 85-year-old mother be discharged to a substandard nursing home against the doctor's orders and the family's wishes after a 12-day stay in the hospital for two heart attacks and a stroke. Carol Mahla's mother died within a day of being transferred. Two days later, the family received a letter informing them of their rights to appeal the discharge.

Mrs. Mahla' story is not unique. Under pressure from the Senate Aging Committee and consumer organizations, HHS recently improved patient notification procedures by requiring hospitals to provide notice of rights upon admission. But this notice stops short of ensuring that patients will be informed of their rights in a way that is clear and understandable. Current regulations, moreover, give hospitalized patients 48 hours to appeal a discharge before they can be held legally liable for any additional billings. Yet the PROs have three working days to respond to the appeal. This leaves the beneficiary at financial risk of having to pay out-of-pocket for one or more days of hospital care while awaiting a decision from the PRO.

The Medicare Quality Protection Act both improves patient notification and reduces the risk of accumulating out-of-pocket costs for hospital care while awaiting a decision from the PRO. First, HCFA would be required to grant beneficiaries 3 calendar days for appeal after receiving written notification of discharge before they begin to incur liability for a continued stay. Second, PROs would be required to decide appeals of continued stay denials within the same timeframe—3 calendar days.

Finally, in cases where the hospital serves a written notice of discharge but does not express intent to bill for a continued stay, the patient will be granted this same right to appeal. This extension of the appeal right plugs a loophole in the law which often results in the hospital telling patients to leave without informing them they can appeal the discharge decision.

3. Prohibit Incentives or "Kickbacks" that Potentially Lead to Reduced Care: At seven hospitals operated by the Paracelsus Health Care Corporation of Pasadena, California, doctors receive bonuses if costs are kept within DRG range. Similar programs elsewhere in the country also provide a one-to-one compensation of the physician for discharging a patient early. By creating a direct monetary incentive to reduce care, this new form of kickback threatens the well-being of Medicare patients. Current Medicare fraud and abuse law does not address this problem.

The Heinz-Stark bill specifically prohibits physician incentive plans that involve a payment for meeting specific per-case length-of-stay or cost targets. Violators of this provision would be subject to a civil monetary penalty. Additionally, the bill requires HHS to develop legislative recommendations by July 1, 1987 to prohibit or regulate other plans that have the effect of pressuring physicians to discharge patients prematurely or to reduce medically appropriate services.

4. Preserving Existing Quality Protections: The Aging Committee's investigation revealed substantial shortcomings in the existing quality assurance standards under both the Joint Commission for Accreditation of Hospitals and the Medicare Conditions of Participation. Yet even these limited protections face dilution by HHS' proposed revisions of the hospital "Conditions of Participation."

This bill requires that within two years of its enactment, HHS must submit to Congress a study concerning the adequacy of existing quality assurance standards for participating hospitals, including but not limited to consideration of the effect of changes in reimbursement policy since 1982. This provision would send a strong signal to HHS to hold off any regulations that might significantly weaken quality assurance requirements, while the Department examines ways to improve these requirements in the future.

II. IMPROVING ACCESS TO POST-HOSPITAL CARE

DRGs drive patients out of hospitals quicker and sicker. This finding is not dangerous in and of itself, since days-of-stay often exceeded what was medically necessary under the old system. But sicker and quicker can be hazardous when combined with the fact that post-hospital services are strained by the burden of more patients needing greater levels of care. For some Medicare beneficiaries, post-hospital care is unavailable or substandard.

The fact that the stress on post-hospital services is substantially increasing was confirmed by the General Accounting Office and by dozens of post-hospital care providers interviewed by the Senate Aging Committee's staff. These witnesses testified that more and sicker patients are being released into the community, often to the care of families who are not prepared or able to adequately care for them. One 65-year-old woman, a bilateral amputee with renal failure, with a colostomy, was sent home to an apartment with no running water, to the care of an unreliable 19-year-old grandchild. A 79-year-old woman hospitalized for a complete hip replacement, unable to walk or feed herself, was sent home alone where she was found several days later by a family member.

The Committee also learned that given the shorter length of stay and reduced staff in many hospitals, patients often are too sick to respond positively to educational efforts and nurses are too shorthanded to spend the extra time needed to train the patient or family for home care.

Shortages in home health and nursing home care are aggravated by widespread illegal discrimination against Medicare and Medicaid eligible patients, witnesses told the Committee. Nursing homes prefer the more profitable private-pay patients and those for whom care is less costly.

HCFA has denied that demand for home health and skilled nursing care has significantly increased under PPS. Nevertheless, the Aging Committee's investigation confirmed with data from HCFA internal reports a nearly 40 percent increase in discharges to skilled-nursing and home health care since October 1983.

Options for community services narrow further when quality becomes part of the supply equation. HCFA cites more than 970 nursing homes as chronically substandard. Mrs. Mahla's mother was forced into such a home, where she died after 14 hours. For too many it is a choice of no bed, or a substandard one.

Access to home health and skilled nursing care is also restricted through the administration of the Medicare home health and SNF benefit. William Dombi, attorney from Legal Assistance for Medicare Patients in Connecticut, testified at the Committee's October, 1985 hearing that HCFA has "circumvented the law and subverted the intent of Congress. . . . through oral and written policy directives, all designed to curtail home health and skilled nursing facility coverage." Mr. Dombi went further to assert that "there are two Medicare programs, the one that is on the books under 42 USC Section 1395 [and the one based upon the] directives of the Health Care Financing Administration." Other witnesses from the long-term-care provider community confirmed that "patients cannot be admitted for care because of restrictive HCFA guidelines".

All of these factors contribute to reduced access to post-hospital care for Medicare patients. While some of these problems existed prior to the implementation of PPS, they clearly are magnified by the increased numbers of sicker patients being discharged from our Nation's hospitals. The Medicare Quality Protection Act addresses this problem in the following ways:

1. Require Discharge Planning: Under current law, only hospitals that voluntarily choose to have a Department of Social Work are required to meet Federal rules for discharge planning (and these rules have been criticized as inadequate by health care professionals). HCFA plans to do away with even these lax rules. Existing hospital discharge planning programs—important mechanisms for assuring that patients are placed in appropriate community settings—are seriously overtaxed under PPS, with the result that Medicare patients often receive inadequate post-hospital care.

Take the case of Mrs. S, a 71-year-old woman who was sent home after a six-day hospitalization. She is legally blind, wears a pacemaker, is a diabetic, and has had a stroke and kidney failure. A home health nurse was not called by the discharge planner for four days. When the nurse arrived, she found the patient alone, with no food, taking the wrong medication dosage. This kind of tragedy should not happen.

The Medicare Quality Protection Act would make discharge planning a condition of participation for hospitals in the Medicare program, and for those hospitals deemed "certified" as a result of JCAH accreditation. Hospitals would also be required to have an effective discharge planning process. The bill spells out procedures to be followed when discharging a patient that were recommended by the American Association for Continuity of Care. Upon request of the patient, the attending physician, or someone acting on the patient's behalf, the hospital would be required to provide an initial discharge planning evaluation. Implementation of a final discharge plan would require approval of the attending physician.

2. Require HHS to study the need for Administratively Necessary Days: Many communities have a severe shortage of skilled nursing beds. Hospital patients in need of skilled nursing care in such a community are placed in a life threatening state of limbo. The hospital that keeps the patient ends up either absorbing the cost for the patient's sub-acute days of stay (Medicare covers only acute days of hospital care) or attempting to recover the loss from the patient. Alternatively, the hospital will send the patient home, with or without the necessary medical and social support services. Too often the latter scenario prevails. And as Medicare continues to ratchet down DRG payments to hospitals, making losses on sub-acute patients even less attractive, the number of elderly being discharged to inappropriate settings will rise.

Prior to PPS, Medicare paid for sub-acute care at a reduced rate until the patient could be transferred to a skilled nursing facility. These were referred to as payments for "administratively necessary days." Given the circumstances outlined above, it may be necessary to reinstate these payments. Under the Heinz-Stark bill, HHS is required to conduct a study to determine whether a separate payment should again be made to a hospital for "administratively necessary days," or days of care provided for skilled nursing patients who cannot be promptly discharged to skilled nursing care. The Secretary is required to report back to Congress not later than January 1, 1988.

3. Eliminate Unpredictable Retrospective Denials of Payment for Post-Hospital Care: Currently, there is a great deal of ambiguity and uncertainty about what Medicare covers for home health or skilled nursing care. This uncertainty is the result of unclear guidelines and vague definitions by HCFA and wide variations in decisions by the fiscal intermediaries (FIs) regarding payment for services needed.

Since the FI makes the coverage decision after services have begun, providers can be left without payment for care already delivered. If a potential patient's coverage under Medicare is in doubt, the facility may decide against providing that patient with services.

The Medicare waiver of liability was designed to give limited financial protection to health care providers who accept patients they have good reason to believe are eligible for coverage, but whose claims are denied after care has begun.

Obviously, elimination of this waiver might discourage health care providers from participating in the Medicare home health and skilled nursing program. But just last year, HCFA proposed that Congress do just that. Strong opposition by Members of Congress, providers, and beneficiaries resulted in Senate language in the Reconciliation Bill to extend the waivers. These provisions were agreed to by both Houses in conference on the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act, and are now part of P.L. 99-272.

The Medicare Quality Protection Act would make permanent the waiver of liability for SNFs and HHAs. In addition, the waiver of liability would be extended to include denials made because it was determined that the patient failed to meet the homebound or intermittency requirements for home health coverage under Medicare. The bill also provides for an expedited retrospective review process, ensuring that the waiver will continue until the review determination is made by the fiscal intermediary. Finally, the bill enables providers to appeal denials of home health and SNF coverage on behalf of beneficiaries.

4. HHS to develop a Uniform Needs Assessment Instrument:

Currently, there is no basis for judging how effectively health care services meet the needs of long term care patients or of ensuring that long term care patients are given the appropriate types or levels of care. A needs assessment tool can help providers to: 1) objectively and consistently evaluate the health care needs of long term care patients and 2) match those needs with appropriate available long term care services. In this way, we can ensure that long term care patients have access to needed health care services and that the long term care system can be wisely developed based on actual patient needs.

The Medicare Quality Protection Act requires HHS to develop, within one year of enactment, a uniform needs assessment instrument that evaluates: 1) the functional capacity of an individual; 2) the nursing and other care requirements of the individual to meet health care needs and to assist with functional incapacities; and 3) the social and familial resources available to the individual to meet those requirements. This instrument shall be developed for the use of discharge planners, hospital and post-hospital providers, and fiscal intermediaries in evaluating an individual's need for post-hospital extended care, home health, and other long-term care services.

III. IMPROVING FOR QUALITY ASSURANCE

HCFA has focused the PROs on a very narrow and incomplete set of quality issues; therefore HCFA's assessment of quality of care is grossly deficient. When the Aging Committee began its investigation in February, 1985, the quality assurance activities of the PROs were extremely limited. Hampered by HCFA's inconsistent and often unreasonable instructions, the PROs were only identifying the tip of the iceberg of quality problems developing under PPS. I am pleased to report that progress has been made in improving the ability of the PROs to monitor quality of care, and to exclude unfit providers and hospitals from delivering care to Medicare beneficiaries. But there are miles to go before the PROs are able to fully and effectively carry out their mandate as the watchdogs of quality under the Medicare program.

Under the new round of PRO contracts, now being negotiated with HCFA, the PROs' scope of review for premature discharges will be limited to those cases where the patient is readmitted to a hospital within fifteen days, and to those instances of possible substandard care that can be detected from using generic quality screens. This means that cases of readmission after fifteen days or to hospitals outside the PRO area, deaths after premature or inappropriate discharge, denials of admission, inappropriate placement out of the hospital and lack of adequate care in the community will still not be reviewed by a PRO.

Thomas Dehn, M.D., President of the American Medical Peer Review Association, testified to the Aging Committee that HCFA primarily wants data from the PROs on utilization of stay—i.e., number of admissions, costs per admission etc.—and is less concerned with quality review. AMPRA's report, "PROs: The Future Agenda", dated September 1985 and prepared by their Task Force on PRO Implementation, states that "The present quality assurance system required under PRO contracts is limited, restrictive, and lacks the innovation needed at a time when the incentives of PPS raise the potential for compromised care. The imposition of quality objectives presupposes baseline data that can validate the existence of quality problems. Given the advent of prospective payment, no such data is available across a wide spectrum of in-patient care to the elderly. Only now are quality care concerns surfacing."

The PROs would thus like to broaden their quality review activities, and to review on a sample basis, quality problems beyond the hospital door. They can only do this, however, if they are given adequate funding and consistent guidelines from HCFA. In reviewing PRO performance, HCFA should give at least equal weight to quality assurance activities as is given to utilization review. In addition, HCFA must establish workable data transfers from the hospital to the PROs that will facilitate timely and efficient quality review.

The Aging Committee also heard from Medicare beneficiaries that PROs often are slow or completely fail to respond to their complaints about quality problems. Nor is there a mechanism to provide for beneficiary participation in decisions affecting PRO activity.

The Medicare Quality Protection Act takes a number of steps to address these problems:

1. Expand PRO Review of Quality of Care: Under the Heinz-Stark bill, PROs will be required to review selected samples of readmissions to hospitals within 30 days. They will also be required to review quality of care in selected home health, nursing, board and care homes, and outpatient hospital settings where they have identified potential quality problems. Finally, the bill requires hospitals to submit monthly data to enable PROs to perform reviews on a timely basis.

2. Allocate PRO Funds to Ensure Increased Quality Care Review: The Medicare Quality Protection Act requires that each PRO provide that a reasonable proportion of its activities are involved with reviewing the quality of services provided in cases and settings for which potential problems of quality have been identified.

3. Improve PRO Accountability to Medicare Beneficiaries: The Heinz-Stark bill would require each PRO to appoint a consumer representative to its board. In addition, PROs would be required to investigate all written complaints about quality of care filed by a beneficiary (or a person acting on behalf of a beneficiary). HHS would develop appropriate procedures for investigating and responding to these complaints. These procedures would provide protection of the confidentiality of the complainant and provide that the PRO's report their findings to the complainant.

IV. IMPROVING DATA ON QUALITY OF CARE UNDER PPS

According to the GAO, HHS lacks any statistically valid basis to confirm or deny the effect of DRGs on the quality of health care older Americans need or receive upon discharge from the hospital. According to GAO testimony, HHS does not have the necessary data to evaluate whether PPS has either increased or decreased the quality, access, demand, use or cost of post-hospital care for Medicare beneficiaries. Furthermore, HHS is not planning to do the types of evaluations that are necessary to determine whether PPS is the cause of changes in these five areas.

1. HHS to Develop a Long-Term Quality Assurance and Review Strategy: The Heinz-Stark bill requires HHS to provide for a study to serve as the basis for establishing a strategy for reviewing and assuring the quality of care under Medicare. In developing this study, HHS shall consult with consumer groups, PROs, the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, professional societies and private purchasers of health care with experience and expertise in monitoring the quality of care.

2. Extend HHS reporting requirements on quality in post-hospital settings: HHS is currently required to report on an annual basis on the impact of PPS. For these reports to be useful, they need to cover PPS effects on both hospital and post-hospital care. Under the Quality Assurance Act, HHS would be required to provide three annual impact reports providing (1) an evaluation of quality assessment and assurance is the "continuum of care"; (2) an assessment of access problems of special beneficiary populations; and (3) data on Part A and Part B beneficiary appeals.

3. Sharing of Confidential Information Regarding Quality of Care: There is a woeful lack of information exchanged about problem health care facilities. Thus, hospital discharge planners are sometimes unaware that they are sending a patient to a substandard nursing home. Under the Medicare Quality Protection Act, instances of gross and flagrant patient neglect as well as patterns of poor quality care, could be shared with selected federally-funded quality assurance officials, provided that adequate assurance of confidentiality can be provided.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2331

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; TABLE OF CONTENTS.

(a) SHORT TITLE.—This Act may be cited as the "Medicare Quality Protection Act of 1986".

(b) TABLE OF CONTENTS.—The table of contents of this Act is as follows:

Sec. 1. Short title; table of contents.

TITLE I—QUALITY ASSURANCE IN INPATIENT HOSPITAL SETTINGS

Sec. 101. Refinement of prospective payment system.

Sec. 208. Including in annual reports on prospective payment system information on quality of post-hospital care.

TITLE III—IMPROVED REVIEW OF QUALITY BY PEER REVIEW ORGANIZATIONS

Sec. 301. PRO review of inpatient hospital services and early readmission cases.
Sec. 302. Requiring PRO review of quality of care.
Sec. 303. Requiring consumer representative on peer review boards.
Sec. 304. Improving peer review responsiveness to beneficiary complaints.
Sec. 305. Sharing of information by peer review organizations.

TITLE IV—STUDY TO DEVELOP A STRATEGY FOR QUALITY REVIEW AND ASSURANCE

Sec. 401. Study to develop a strategy for quality review and assurance.

TITLE I—QUALITY ASSURANCE IN INPATIENT HOSPITAL SETTINGS

SEC. 101. REFINEMENT OF PROSPECTIVE PAYMENT SYSTEM.

(a) DEVELOPMENT OF LEGISLATIVE PROPOSAL.—The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall develop and submit to Congress a specific legislative proposal to improve the classification and payment system under section 1886(d) of the Social Security Act (and, as appropriate, the system for payment of outliers under section 1886(d)(5)(A) of such Act) in order to assure that the amount of payment per discharge approximates the cost of medically necessary care provided in an efficient manner for individual patients or classes of patients with similar conditions.

(b) ACCOUNTING FOR SEVERITY OF ILLNESS.—In developing the proposal, the Secretary shall account for variations in severity of illness and case complexity which are not adequately accounted for by the current classification and payment system.

(c) DEADLINE.—The proposal shall be submitted to Congress by not later than January 1, 1988.

SEC. 102. REQUIRING NOTICE OF HOSPITAL DISCHARGE RIGHTS.

(a) REQUIREMENT FOR HOSPITALS TO PROVIDE STATEMENT.—Section 1866(a)(1) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395cc(a)(1)), as amended by sections 9121(a), 9122(a), and 9403(b) of the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985, is amended—

(1) by striking "and" at the end of the subparagraph (I) inserted by section 9121(a) of such Act,

(2) by striking the period at the end of subparagraph (J) and inserting a comma,

(3) by redesignating the subparagraph (I) inserted by section 9403(b) of such Act as subparagraph (K) and by inserting it after subparagraph (J), and

(4) by inserting after subparagraph (K) the following new subparagraph:

"(L) in the case of hospitals, to provide to each individual who is entitled to benefits under part A (or to a legally responsible person or persons acting on the individual's behalf), at or about the time of the individual's admission as an inpatient to the hospital, a written statement (containing such language as the Secretary prescribes consistent with this paragraph) which explains—

"(i) the individual's rights to benefits for inpatient hospital services and for post-hospital services under this title,

"(ii) the circumstances under which such an individual will and will not be liable for charges for continued stay in the hospital,

"(iii) the individual's right to appeal denials of benefits for continued inpatient hospital services, including the practical steps to initiate such an appeal, and

"(iv) the individual's liability for payment for services if such a denial of benefits is upheld on appeal."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall first prescribe the language required under section 1866(a)(1)(L) of the Social Security Act not later than six months after the date of the enactment of this Act. The requirement of such section shall apply to admissions to hospitals occurring on such date (not later than 60 days after the date such language is first prescribed) as the Secretary shall provide.

SEC. 103. PRO REVIEW OF HOSPITAL DENIAL OVER NOTICES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1154 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1320c-3) is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(d)(1) If—

"(A) a hospital has determined that a patient no longer requires inpatient hospital care, and

"(B) the attending physician has agreed with the hospital's determination, the hospital may provide the patient (or the patient's representative) with a notice (meeting conditions prescribed by the Secretary under section 1879) of the determination.

"(2) If—

"(A) a hospital has determined that a patient no longer requires inpatient hospital care, but

"(B) the attending physician has not agreed with the hospital's determination, the hospital may request the appropriate peer review organization to review under subsection (a) the validity of the hospital's determination.

"(3) If a patient (or a patient's representative)—

"(A) has received a notice under paragraph (1), and

"(B) while the patient is still an inpatient in the hospital, requests the appropriate peer review organization to review the determination, then, the organization shall conduct a review under subsection (a) of the validity of the hospital's determination and shall provide notice (by telephone and in writing) to the patient or representative of the results of the review not later than 2 calendar days after the date the organization receives the request. Such review shall be conducted regardless of whether or not the hospital will charge for continued hospital care or the patient will be liable for payment for such continued care.

"(4) If—

"(A) a request is made under paragraph (3) not later than 1 day after the date the patient (or patient's representative) receives the notice under paragraph (1), and

"(B) the conditions described in section 1879(a)(2) with respect to the patient or representative are met, the hospital may not charge the patient for inpatient hospital services furnished on a day before the fourth day that begins after the date of receipt of the notice under paragraph (1).

"(5) In any review conducted under paragraph (2) or (3), the organization shall solicit the views of the patient involved (or the patient's representative)."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), the amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to denial notices furnished by hospitals to individuals on and after the first day of the first month that begins more than 30 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(2) Section 1154(d)(4) of the Social Security Act (as added by the amendment made by subsection (a)) shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 104. PROHIBITION OF CERTAIN PHYSICIAN INCENTIVE PLANS.

(a) MAKING CERTAIN PLANS SUBJECT TO CIVIL MONETARY PENALTIES.—Section 1128A of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1320a-7a) is amended—

(1) by striking "subsection (a)" each place it appears and inserting "subsection (a) or (b)",

(2) in subsection (f), by striking "subsection (d)" and inserting "subsection (e)",

(3) by redesignating subsections (b) through (h) as subsection (c) through (i), respectively, and

(4) by inserting after subsection (a) the following new subsection:

"(b)(1) If—

"(A) a hospital makes a payment, directly or indirectly, to a physician as an inducement to reduce the length of stay or services provided with respect to an identifiable patient (who is entitled to benefits under part A of title XVIII), and

"(B) the payment is based on a specific length of stay or targeted amount of services with respect to the patient, the hospital shall be subject, in addition to any other penalties that may be prescribed by law, to a civil money penalty of twice the amount of the payment plus an amount of not more than $2,000 for each patient with respect to which the payment is made.

"(2) Any physician who knowingly accepts receipt of a payment described in paragraph (1) shall be subject, in addition to any other penalties that may be prescribed by law, to a civil money penalty of twice the amount of the payment plus an amount of not more than $2,000 for each patient with respect to which the payment is made."

(b) STUDY OF ADDITIONAL SANCTIONS.—The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall develop and report to Congress, not later than July 1, 1987, on specific legislative changes that should be made to prohibit other physician incentive plans that have the effect of pressuring physicians improperly to discharge patients from hospitals before their discharge is medically appropriate or to reduce medically appropriate services.

SEC. 105. REVIEW OF STANDARDS FOR MEDICARE CONDITIONS OF PARTICIPATION FOR ASSURING QUALITY OF INPATIENT HOSPITAL SERVICES.

The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall arrange for a study the adequacy of the standards used for hospitals, for purposes of meeting the conditions of participation under title XVIII of the Social Security Act, in assuring the quality of services furnished in the hospitals. The Secretary shall report to Congress on the results of the study by not later than 2 years after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 106. STUDY OF PAYMENT FOR ADMINISTRATIVELY NECESSARY DAYS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall conduct a study—

(1) to determine—

(A) the extent to which costs of hospitals attributable to administratively necessary days have been incorporated into payments under section 1886(d) of the Social Security Act, and

(B) to the extent they have been, the extent to which the distribution among hospitals of payments under such section relating to such costs actually reflects such hospitals' costs for administratively necessary days; and

(2) to determine whether a payment should be made (in a budget-neutral manner under title XVIII of such Act to hospitals receiving payments under section 1886(d) of such Act) to a hospital for administratively necessary days, separate from the per-discharge and outlier payments made under such section.

(b) ADMINISTRATIVELY NECESSARY DAYS DEFINED.—In this section, an "administratively necessary day" is a day of continued inpatient hospital stay, for an individual entitled to benefits under part A of title XVIII of the Social Security Act, necessitated by a delay in obtaining placement for the individual in a skilled nursing facility.

(c) CONSIDERATIONS IN CONDUCTING STUDY.—In conducting the study, the Secretary shall consider—

(1) the need for such a payment in order to minimize—

(A) the disproportionate financial impact of current law on certain hospitals (or hospitals in certain locations) due to difficulties in arranging for appropriate post-hospital care, such as difficulties resulting from a shortage of beds in skilled nursing facilities where those hospitals are located and from the source of payment for such care, and

(B) the risk of inappropriate discharge to a non-institutional or inappropriate institutional setting of individuals who need post-hospital services in a skilled nursing facility, and

(2) the administrative mechanisms that can be used to prevent inappropriate payments for administratively necessary days.

(d) REPORT ON STUDY.—The Secretary shall report to Congress on the results of the study not later than January 1, 1988.

TITLE II—ACCESS TO APPROPRIATE POST-HOSPITAL CARE

SEC. 201. REQUIRING HOSPITALS TO PROVIDE DISCHARGE PLANNING PROCESS.

(a) REQUIREMENT AS CONDITION OF PARTICIPATION.—Section 1861(e)(6) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395x(e)(6)) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(A)" after "(6)", and

(2) by inserting before the semicolon at the end the following: "and (B) has in place a discharge planning process that meets the requirements of subsection (ee)".

(b) DISCHARGE PLANNING PROCESS.—Section 1861 of such Act is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"Discharge Planning Process

"(ee)(1) A discharge planning process of a hospital shall be considered sufficient if it is applicable to services furnished by the hospital to individuals entitled to insurance benefits under this title and if it meets the guidelines and standards established by the Secretary under paragraph (2).

"(2) The Secretary shall develop guidelines and standards for the discharge planning process in order to ensure a timely and smooth transition to the most appropriate type of and setting for post-hospital or rehabilitative care. The guidelines and standards shall include the following:

"(A) The hospital must identify, at an early stage of hospitalization, those patients who are likely to suffer adverse health consequences upon discharge in the absence of adequate discharge planning.

"(B) Hospitals must provide a discharge planning evaluation for patients identified under subparagraph (A) and for other patients upon the request of the patient, patient's representative, or patient's physician.

"(C) Any discharge planning evaluation must be made on a timely basis to ensure that appropriate arrangements for post-hospital care will be made before discharge and to avoid unnecessary delays in discharge.

"(D) A discharge planning evaluation must include an evaluation of a patient's likely need for appropriate post-hospital services and the availability of those services.

"(E) The results of a discharge planning evaluation must be made available to the patient (or the patient's representative) and the patient's physician for use in establishing an appropriate discharge plan.

"(F) Upon the request of a patient's physician, the hospital must arrange for the development and initial implementation of a discharge plan for the patient.

"(G) Any discharge planning evaluation or discharge plan required under this paragraph must be developed by, or under the supervision of, a registered professional nurse, social worker, or other appropriately qualified personnel."

(c) EFFECT OF ACCREDITATION.—The second sentence of section 1865(a) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1395bb(a)) is amended—

(1) by inserting ", requires a discharge planning process (or imposes another requirement which services substantially the same purpose)," after "the same purpose)", and

(2) by inserting "clause (A) or (B) of" after "comply also with".

(d) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The requirements of section 1861(ee) of the Social Security Act shall apply to agreements entered into with hospitals, under section 1866 of the Social Security Act, on or after one year after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 202. EXTENSION OF WAIVER OF LIABILITY PROVISIONS TO CERTAIN COVERAGE DENIALS FOR HOME HEALTH SERVICES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1879 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395pp) is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)(1), by inserting "or by reason of a coverage denial described in subsection (f)" after "section 1862(a)(1) or (9)";

(2) in the first sentence of subsection (a), by inserting "and as though the coverage denial described in subsection (f) had not occurred" before the period at the end;

(3) in the third sentence, by inserting "or by reason of a coverage denial described in subsection (f)" after "section 1862(a)(1) or (9)";

(4) in subsection (c), by inserting "or by reason of a coverage denial described in subsection (f)" after "section 1862(a)(1) or (9)"; and

(5) by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(f) The coverage denial described in this subsection is, with respect to the provision of home health services to an individual, a failure to meet the requirements of section 1814(a)(2)(C) or 1835(a)(2)(A) in that the individual—

"(1) is or was not confined to his home, or

"(2) does or did not need skilled nursing care on an intermittent basis or physical, speech, or occupational therapy."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsection (a) shall apply to coverage denials occurring on or after the first day of the first month that begins more than 90 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 203. CONTINUING OF FAVORABLE PRESUMPTION OF WAIVER OF LIABILITY FOR SKILLED NURSING FACILITIES AND HOME HEALTH AGENCIES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1879 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395pp), as amended by section 202, is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(g)(1)(A) A skilled nursing facility which meets the applicable requirements of paragraphs (3) and (4) shall be presumed to meet the requirement of subsection (a)(2) with respect to denials of coverage by reason of section 1862(a)(1) or (9).

"(B) A home health agency which meets the applicable requirements—

"(i) of paragraphs (3) and (4) shall be presumed to meet the requirement of subsection (a)(2) with respect to denials of coverage by reason of section 1862(a)(1) or (9), and

"(ii) of paragraphs (3) and (5) shall be presumed to meet the requirement of subsection (a)(2) with respect to any coverage denial described in subsection (f).

"(2) The presumption of paragraph (1) with respect to specific services may be rebutted by actual or imputed knowledge of the facts described in subsection (a)(2), including any of the following:

"(A) Notice by the fiscal intermediary of the fact that payment may not be made under this title with respect to the services.

"(B) In the case of a skilled nursing facility, the committee or group responsible for the conduct of utilization review for the facility has informed the facility that payment may not be made under this title with respect to the services.

"(C) It is clear and obvious that the provider should have known at the time the services were furnished that they were excluded from coverage.

"(3) The requirements of this paragraph are as follows:

"(A) The facility or agency complies with requirements of the Secretary under this title respecting timely submittal of bills for payment and medical documentation.

"(B) The facility or agency has reasonable procedures to notify promptly each patient (and the patient's physician) where it is determined that a patient is being or will be furnished items or services which are excluded from coverage under this title.

"(4) The requirement of this paragraph is that, on the basis of bills submitted by the facility or agency during the previous quarter, the rate of denial of bills by reason of section 1862(a)(1) or (9) for the facility or agency does not exceed—

"(A) 5 percent, in the case of skilled nursing facilities computed based on days of post-hospital extended care services care covered, or

"(B) 2.5 percent, in the case of home health agencies computed based on visits for home health services covered.

"(5) The requirement of this paragraph is that, on the basis of bills submitted by a home health agency during the previous quarter, the rate of denial of bills for the agency by reason of a coverage denial described in subsection (f) does not exceed 2.5 percent, computed based on visits for home health services covered.

"(6) The Secretary, annually, shall report to Congress—

"(A) information on the frequency and distribution (by types of providers) of denials referred to in paragraphs (4) and (5), including—

"(i) the reasons for such denials,

"(ii) the extent to which payments were nonetheless made because of this section, and

"(iii) the rate of reversals of such denials, and

"(B) such other information as may be appropriate to evaluate the appropriateness of the percentage standards established under such paragraphs (4) and (5).

"(7) In this subsection, the term 'fiscal intermediary' means, with respect to a skilled nursing facility or home health agency, an agency or organization with an agreement under section 1816 with respect to the facility or agency and includes, with respect to a home health agency, a carrier with a contract under section 1842 with respect to the agency."

(b) REPEALING DUPLICATIVE PROVISIONS.—Section 9205 of the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985, and subsection (c) of section 9126 of such Act, are repealed.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) shall apply to services for which a notice of coverage denial (described in section 1879(f) of the Social Security Act) is made on or after the first day of the first calendar quarter that begins at least 90 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 204. DEVELOPMENT OF UNIFORM NEEDS ASSESSMENT INSTRUMENT.

(a) DEVELOPMENT.—The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall develop a uniform needs assessment instrument that—

(1) evaluates—

(A) the functional capacity of an individual,

(B) the nursing and other care requirements of the individual to meet health care needs and to assist with functional incapacities, and

(C) the social and familial resources available to the individual to meet those requirements; and

(2) can be used by discharge planners, hospitals, nursing facilities, other health care providers, and fiscal intermediaries in evaluating an individual's need for post-hospital extended care services, home health services, and long-term care services of a health-related or supportive nature.

(b) ADVISORY PANEL.—The Secretary shall develop the instrument in consultation with an advisory panel, appointed by the Secretary, that includes experts in the delivery of post-hospital extended care services, home health services, and long-term care services and representatives of skilled nursing facilities, of home health agencies, of long-term care providers, of fiscal intermediaries, and of medicare beneficiaries.

(c) REPORT ON INSTRUMENT.—The Secretary shall report to Congress, not later than 1 year after the date of the enactment of this Act, on the instrument developed under this section. The report shall include an evaluation of the advantages and disadvantages of using the instrument as the basis for determining whether payment should be made for post-hospital extended care services and home health services provided to individuals entitled to benefits under part A of title XVIII of the Social Security Act.

SEC. 205. EXPEDITED REVIEW BY FISCAL INTERMEDIARIES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1879 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395pp), as amended by sections 202 and 203 of this title, is further amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(h) The Secretary shall develop procedures to expedite the determination of whether initial claims submitted for post-hospital extended care services and home health services provided (or to be provided) to an individual may be reimbursed under this title, so as to minimize the time between (1) when the provider first provides the services to the individual, and (2) when the provider first receives notice of an initial determination on whether or not payment may be made under this title for some or all of the services provided the individual."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall provide for the expedited procedures described in section 1879(h) of the Social Security Act not later than one year after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 206. PROMPT RESPONSE TO INQUIRIES CONCERNING EXHAUSTION OF MEDICARE SKILLED NURSING FACILITY BENEFIT.

The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall provide, in the administration of part A of title XVIII of the Social Security Act and by not later than 9 months after the date of the enactment of this Act, for a response within 24 hours to any inquiry by a beneficiary (and to any inquiry by a hospital or skilled nursing facility with the beneficiary's consent) to the Secretary concerning whether the beneficiary's benefits under section 1812(a)(2) of such Act (relating to post-hospital extended care services) have been exhausted.

SEC. 207. PROVIDER REPRESENTATION OF BENEFICIARIES ON APPEALS AND PERMITTING APPEAL OF CERTAIN TECHNICAL DENIALS.

(a) PERMITTING PROVIDER REPRESENTATION OF BENEFICIARIES.—Section 1869(b)(1) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395ff(b)(1)) is amended by adding at the end the following new sentence: "Sections 206(a), 1102, and 1871 shall not be construed as authorizing the Secretary to prohibit an individual from being represented under this subsection by a person that furnishes or supplies the individual, directly or indirectly, with services or items solely on the basis that the person furnishes or supplies the individual with such a service or item.".

(b) PERMITTING REVIEW OF TECHNICAL DENIALS.—Section 1869 of such Act is further amended—

(1) in subsection (a), by inserting ", the amount of benefits with respect to home health services under part B, and any other determination with respect to a claim for benefits under part A" after "part A,", and

(2) in subsection (b)(1)—

(A) by striking "or" at the end of subparagraph (B),

(B) by inserting ", or" at the end of subparagraph (C), and

(C) by inserting after subparagraph (C) the following new subparagraph:

"(D) any other denial (other than under part B of title XI) of a claim for benefits under part A or a claim for benefits with respect to home health services under part B,".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by this section take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 208. INCLUDING IN ANNUAL REPORTS ON PROSPECTIVE PAYMENT SYSTEM INFORMATION ON QUALITY OF POST-HOSPITAL CARE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 603(a)(2) of the Social Security Amendments of 1983 is amended—

(1) by striking "1987" in subparagraph (A) and inserting "1989", and

(2) by adding at the end the following new subparagraph:

"(E) In each annual report to Congress under subparagraph (A), the Secretary shall include—

"(i) an evaluation of the adequacy of the procedures for assuring quality of post-hospital services furnished under title XVIII of the Social Security Act,

"(ii) an assessment of problems that have prevented groups of medicare beneficiaries (including those eligible for medical assistance under title XIX of such Act) from receiving appropriate post-hospital services covered under such title, and

"(iii) information on reconsiderations and appeals taken under title XVIII of such Act with respect to payment for post-hospital services."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a)(2) shall apply to reports for years beginning with 1986.

TITLE III—IMPROVED REVIEW OF QUALITY BY PEER REVIEW ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 301. PRO REVIEW OF INPATIENT HOSPITAL SERVICES AND EARLY READMISSION CASES.

(a) TIMELY PROVISION OF HOSPITAL INFORMATION.—Section 1153 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1320c-2) is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(g) The Secretary shall provide that peer review organizations receive, each month on a timely basis, data from hospitals necessary to initiate the review process under section 1154(a) on a timely basis."

(b) REQUIRING REVIEW OF EARLY READMISSION CASES.—Section 1154(a) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1320c-3(a)), as amended by section 9401(a) of the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985, is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(13) Notwithstanding paragraph (4), the organization shall perform the review described in paragraph (1) with respect to early readmission cases to determine if the previous inpatient hospital services and the post-hospital services met professionally recognized standards of health care. Such reviews may be performed on a sample basis if the organization and the Secretary determine it to be appropriate. In this paragraph, an 'early readmission case' is a case in which an individual, after discharge from a hospital, is readmitted to a hospital less than 31 days after the date of the most recent previous discharge."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATES.—(1) The Secretary shall implement the amendment made by subsection (a) not later than 6 months after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(2) The amendment made by subsection (b) shall apply to contracts entered into or renewed on or after January 1, 1987.

SEC. 302. REQUIRING PRO REVIEW OF QUALITY OF CARE.

(a) ALLOCATION OF FUNDS FOR QUALITY CARE REVIEW.—Section 1154(a)(4) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1320c-3(a)(4)) is amended by adding at the end the following: "Each peer review organization shall provide that a reasonable proportion of its activities are involved with reviewing, under paragraph (1)(B), the quality of services and that a reasonable allocation of such activities is made among the different cases and settings (including post-acute-care settings, ambulatory settings, and health maintenance organizations) for which potential problems of quality have been identified.".

(b) IDENTIFICATION OF METHODS FOR IDENTIFYING CASES OF SUBSTANDARD CARE.—Section 1154 of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1320c-3), as amended by section 103(a) of this Act is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(e) The Secretary, in consultation with appropriate experts, shall identify methods that would be available to assist peer review organizations (under subsection (a)(4)) in identifying those cases which are more likely than others to be associated with a quality of services which does not meet professionally recognized standards of health care."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATES.—(1) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to contracts entered into or renewed on or after January 1, 1987.

(2) The amendment made by the subsection (b) becomes effective on the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 303. REQUIRING CONSUMER REPRESENTATIVE ON PEER REVIEW BOARDS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1152 of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1320c-1) is amended—

(1) by striking "and" at the end of paragraph (1),

(2) by striking the period at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting "; and", and

(3) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(3) has at least one individual who is a representative of consumers on its board of directors."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to contracts entered into or renewed on or after January 1, 1987.

SEC. 304. IMPROVING PEER REVIEW RESPONSIVENESS TO BENEFICIARY COMPLAINTS.

(a) APPROPRIATE INVESTIGATION OF COMPLAINTS REQUIRED.—Section 1154(a) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1320c-3(a)), as amended by section 301(a) of this title, is further amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(14) The organization shall conduct an appropriate investigation of all written complaints about the quality of services (for which payment may otherwise be made under title XVIII) not meeting professionally recognized standards of health care, if the complaint is filed with the organization by a individual entitled to benefits for such services under such title (or a person acting on the individual's behalf). The fact that such a complaint is made and the name of the complainant shall be treated as confidential. The organization shall inform the individual (or representative) of the organization's findings respecting the complaint."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to complaints received on or after the first day of the first month that begins at least 9 months after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 305. SHARING OF INFORMATION BY PEER REVIEW ORGANIZATIONS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 1160(b)(1) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1320c-9(b)(1)) is amended—

(1) in subparagraph (C), by striking "is required" and inserting "are required",

(2) by striking "and" at the end of subparagraph (B), and

(3) by adding at the end the following new subparagraph:

"(D) to assist—

"(i) national accreditation bodies which are acting, pursuant to section 1865, in accrediting providers for purposes of meeting the conditions described in provisions in title XVIII, and

"(ii) State ombudsmen and State protection and advocacy officials who the Secretary identifies as having responsibility for assuring the quality of care furnished by providers or practitioners, which data and information shall be provided by the peer review organization to any such body, ombudsman, or official upon request relating to a specific provider or practitioner, but only to the extent that such data and information are related to the quality of care furnished by a provider or practitioner and only if the peer review organization determines that the data and information may reflect a failure in a substantial number of cases or a gross and flagrant failure in one or more instances to provide services of a quality which meets professionally recognized standards of health care, and that the data and information are needed by the body, ombudsman, or official in carrying out official duties;".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by subsection (a) shall apply to requests for data and information made on and after the end of the 6-month period beginning on the date of the enactment of this Act.

TITLE IV—STUDY TO DEVELOP A STRATEGY FOR QUALITY REVIEW AND ASSURANCE

SEC. 401. STUDY TO DEVELOP A STRATEGY FOR QUALITY REVIEW AND ASSURANCE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of Health and Human Services shall arrange for a study to serve as the basis for establishing a strategy for reviewing and assuring the quality of care for which payment may be made under title XVIII of the Social Security Act (the medicare program).

(b) ITEMS INCLUDED IN STUDY.—Among other items, the study shall—

(1) identify the appropriate considerations which should be used in defining "quality of care";

(2) evaluate the relative roles of structure, process, and outcome standards in assuring quality of care;

(3) consider whether criteria and standards for defining and measuring quality of care should be developed and, if so, how this should be done;

(4) evaluate the adequacy and focus of the current methods for measuring, reviewing, and assuring quality of care;

(5) evaluate the current research on methodologies for measuring quality of care, and suggest areas of research needed for further progress;

(6) evaluate the adequacy and range of methods available to correct or prevent identified problems with quality of care;

(7) review mechanisms available for coordinating and supervising at the national level quality review and assurance activities; and

(8) develop general criteria which may be used in establishing priorities in the allocation of funds and personnel in reviewing and assuring quality of care.

(c) REPORT.—The Secretary shall submit to Congress, not later than 2 years after the date of the enactment of this Act, a report on the study. Such report shall address the items described in subsection (b) and shall include recommendations with respect to strengthening quality assurance and review activities for services furnished under the medicare program.

(d) CONSULTATION IN STUDY.—In developing plans for the conduct of the study, the Secretary shall assure that consumer and provider groups, peer review organizations, the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, professional societies, and private purchasers of care with experience and expertise in the monitoring of the quality of care are consulted.●

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, as ranking Democratic member of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of the Medicare Quality Protection Act of 1986—a major Aging Committee initiative.

With the enactment of the prospective payment system [PPS] based on diagnosis-related groups [DRG's], we dramatically changed the nature of Medicare reimbursement to hospitals. We knew then that with these major changes, we would need to guard against new forms of program abuse and/or misunderstandings that might crop up, in addition to shortcomings of the payment system itself. This past fall, the Aging Committee held three hearings to examine the Medicare program, in terms of quality and access to care in the hospital setting and following discharge from a hospital. The legislation which we are introducing today reflects the findings of that series of hearings.

The Medicare Quality Protection Act includes many desirable and good policy objectives that should result in fairer reimbursement rates to hospitals and better patient care. Under current law, DRG payments are packaged by the average cost of a single diagnosis, with "outlier" payments for exceptional cases. However, as our hearings pointed out, this arrangement is biased against recognizing the cost of caring for patients with multiple conditions and diagnoses. The legislation would require the Department of Health and Human Services [DHHS] to work to refine the prospective payment system to better account for variations in the severity of illness and case mix complexity within each DRG. In addition to developing a legislative proposal on this kind of adjustment, DHHS would be required to consider possible changes in current outlier policy as an alternative method of accounting for differences in severity.

The Aging Committee's hearings highlighted circumstances of Medicare beneficiaries leaving hospitals still in need of serious medical care and attention. The Medicare Quality Protection Act would require DHHS to provide Medicare patients with more explicit notice of their rights to hospital care under DRG's including their right to appeal denials of continued hospitalization. It would also provide for expedited review of these appeals. This legislation would mandate a discharge planning service as a condition for participation for hospitals under Medicare. Finally, it would prohibit hospitals from offering "kickbacks" or other incentives to physicians for reducing hospital days of care for Medicare patients, and would provide for penalties for physicians who accepted such "kickbacks."

Our hearings underscored the fact that access to skilled nursing benefits and home health services is essential when Medicare patients are leaving hospitals quicker and sicker under DRG's. "Quicker and sicker" in and of itself is not a problem if acute hospital care is no longer needed. However, alternative forms of appropriate posthospital care must be available to Medicare beneficiaries. The committee's hearings demonstrated that when quality postacute services are available, too often Medicare will not pay for them as a result of administration-initiated changes in skilled nursing and home health benefits and coverage criteria. Moreover, in some communities, suitable postacute care is in short supply and has long waiting lines.

The Medicare Quality Protection Act would help maintain beneficiary access to postacute nursing home and home health care by making the Medicare waiver of liability permanent and by broadening its applicability. Through regulation, the administration attempted to eliminate the waiver of liability, which provides limited financial protection to skilled nursing and home health providers who accept patients whom they have good reason to believe are eligible for Medicare coverage, but whose claims are subsequently denied. Fortunately, the recently enacted reconciliation bill blunted the administration's efforts by extending the waiver and today's legislation will make it permanent. The applicability of the waiver would be broadened to include denials related to the homebound and intermittency requirements, which have created major difficulties for beneficiaries and providers.

This legislation would require the Secretary of DHHS to develop a uniform needs assessment instrument to assist in evaluating the individual beneficiary's need for posthospital nursing home, home health, and other long-term care services. The instrument would be used by discharge planners, health care providers and the fiscal intermediaries to identify the appropriate services needed by individuals after their period of acute hospitalization.

The Medicare Quality Protection Act would expand the responsibilities of the peer review organizations [PRO's] to strengthen quality of care review within the hospital setting and then extend it, for the first time, beyond the hospital doors. Witness after witness testified before the committee that skilled nursing homes and home health agencies are seeing a significant increase in Medicare patients who require more intensive care, thus straining the ability of these facilities to provide adequate services. Under the bill, PRO's would begin evaluating care in selected home health, nursing, board and care homes, health maintenance organizations [HMO's], and other outpatient hospital settings where they have identified potential problems. They would also be required to investigate all written beneficiary complaints regarding substandard medical care, and to do sample quality of care assessments of Medicare hospital readmissions within 30 days of discharge.

When the Congress enacted the prospective payment system, it intended for the peer review organizations to be the quality of care "watch dogs" under DRG's. Clearly, however, as our hearings highlighted, the PRO's have not been given the budget or directives to do this job. We are saving billions of dollars annually with the new prospective payment system and if we want PPS to keep on working and saving us this money, we must commit some Federal dollars to quality assessment and assurances. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that this legislation will cost $200 million over the next 3 years. I believe that this is a modest cost to pay to make the system work better and more fairly than it has been working.

As my colleagues well know, ultimately, the Medicare program's success is only as good as the quality of care it delivers. I hope that others will join us in cosponsoring this measure.●

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I rise to join my colleagues from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ] and Ohio [Mr. GLENN] in introducing the Medicare Quality Protection Act. This bill is aimed at ensuring that the elderly receive the quality health services to which they are entitled.

Mr. President, in an attempt to control rapidly increasing hospital costs, in 1983 the Congress enacted a new prospective method for reimbursing hospitals for their Medicare patients utilizing diagnosis related groupings, or DRG's. The DRG system has helped to contain hospital costs, but with unintended consequences; there is growing evidence that, in some cases, Medicare patients are being turned away from hospitals, sent home too soon, or released needing home care that is often unavailable. This problem, which is national in scope, needs to be addressed.

The DRG system provides an incentive for hospitals to reduce the length of a hospital stay to only that period of time where acute care is absolutely required for a patient. This means that some people leave the hospital "sicker and quicker." And as Gramm-Rudman puts further limits on inhospital reimbursement rates, it is natural to assume that hospitals will be under increasing pressure to reduce hospital costs, thereby discharging patients earlier and earlier. If Medicare continues to be cut back, as projected under Gramm-Rudman, we must question whether traditional standards of quality care can be maintained.

Mr. President, when services in hospitals are cut back, there is an obvious need to increase the availability of home care services to fill the gap; and that is what we have seen over the past few years. But what we are witnessing in New Jersey is an actual reduction in the number of patients being admitted to home care and a significant increase in the number of patients being denied Medicare coverage for home care services. Why? This administration, through massive bureaucratic redtape and ambiguous rulings, is doing everything in its power to cut home care for people discharged from the hospital.

We need to act—today—before this problem worsens. This legislation is aimed at ensuring that the elderly receive quality health care services—both in the hospital and after they are discharged from the hospital. The three central provisions of the bill are as follows:

First, hospitals would be required to develop a "discharge plan" for each Medicare recipient prior to release from a hospital. The discharge plan allows for proper planning for the care of patients in their home following a hospital stay. I am pleased to report that New Jersey already requires its hospitals to establish discharge plans; I believe that this is one reason there is little evidence that New Jersey patients are being sent home too soon.

Second, the bill expands peer review. The primary role of peer review organizations currently is to police overutilizations of services. The bill requires that peer review organizations also sanction health care providers for a failure to provide medically necessary services. In addition, peer review organizations, which now review hospital admissions for their medical necessity, would also be required to review home care cases as well.

Third, the bill allows health care providers to appeal HCFA's decision to deny benefits to patients.

Mr. President, these are not the only steps that are needed to ensure that the elderly receive the services that they need. Indeed, I am working on legislation to establish standards to guide decisions about eligibility to home care services. But this legislation is a good step. I believe it will help to ensure that the elderly receive quality medical care—both in hospitals and, where required, in their homes after they are discharged.●

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the distinguished chairman of the Senate Aging Committee, and others in introducing the Medicare Quality Protection Act.

This is much needed legislation. Almost not a day goes by that my office doesn't receive a plea for help from one or more Floridians who have been affected by the impact of DRG's on the Medicare Program. Additionally, I was privileged to participate in a series of hearings over the last few months by the Aging Committee that documented clearly that while we have been successful in lowering the rapidly escalating costs of Medicare, we may have done this at the expense of quality health care.

The issues addressed in this legislation, in some cases, are not new to Members. About 2 months ago, a number of us sent a letter to Secretary of Health and Human Services Bowen requesting that he move immediately to ensure that beneficiaries of Medicare were informed of their rights. He took action and has assured us that this information is not routinely being made available. But more needs to be done, and this bill would move toward further correction of these problems.

I am particularly incensed that certain providers are giving "kickbacks' and pressuring doctors to discharge patients early, many times against their better medical judgment. This legislation would provide civil penalties for such practices.

In many instances it may be permissible to discharge patients in order that they can recuperate at home, or in other more appropriate levels of care. But such discharges, however medically appropriate, should not be forced on individuals who have nowhere to turn, and no one at home to look after them. This legislation would make the provision of discharge planning a condition of participation for hospitals in the Medicare Program. Hopefully, this would assure that we would not hear more stories of tragedies caused by inappropriate discharges.

While I am in no way spelling out all the provisions in this legislation that are important, I do want to say one more thing to my colleagues. Over the years, I have been more and more concerned about the amount of money being spent by the Federal Government that we did not have. I have supported different measures to make our Government programs more cost efficient, but never did I do so with the intent of providing substandard care for those whom the programs were designed to serve. In this instance, the DRG system may have been a step in the right direction, and it has produced measurable results. But the time has come to make crucial improvements to the program, before the "solution" tears down the program it was supposed to rescue. We need to enact the Medicare Quality Protection Act and restore the confidence of the public in our Medicare Program. I hope that others will join us in this endeavor.●

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senator HEINZ, Senator GLENN and several other of my colleagues in being an original cosponsor of S. 2331, the Medicare Quality Protection Act of 1986. It is absolutely essential, during this transitional period in the health care field, that we work to maintain and improve the quality of health care for all Americans.

Over the past several years, we have instituted major changes in the Medicare Program. Most of those changes were motivated by our desire to control the rapidly spiraling cost of providing care for the 37 million Americans eligible to receive benefits under the Medicare Program. Medicare spending has been cut every year over the last 6, contributing more than $30 billion to deficit reduction. As part of those reductions and modifications in health care payments, reimbursement for inpatient hospital services is now made prospectively according to diagnoses; a system of payments known as DRG's. Hospitals and other health care providers have been forced to undertake cost containment measures, and a significant amount of waste has been trimmed from the health care system. Length of hospital stays have been reduced and admissions have not increased. In addition to the Federal Government saving billions of dollars, the forced increase in efficiency has resulted in record profits for a majority of hospitals across the country.

However, Mr. President, this is only part of the story. While the Federal Government and many hospitals might be benefiting under our new Medicare Program, it is unclear that the experience of our Nation's elderly and disabled persons has been as positive. The House Select Committee on Aging has recently completed an analysis of the dollars America's senior citizens pay for health care and concluded that they are significantly worse off in terms of health care costs than they were in the late seventies. During the earlier period, health care consumed about 12 percent of senior citizens' income. In 1986, this had jumped to just over 16 percent or an average of $1,850 per person. What's worse is that this figure is anticipated to climb to 18.5 percent of income by 1991, or $2,633 per person. This compares to only $712 in 1977, $966 in 1980, and $1,526 in 1984. In fact, it was recently announced that the Medicare hospital deductible will increase a whopping $80 in 1987, after jumping $92 this year—the biggest increase in the history of the program. What is ironic is that these recent increases in the hospital deductible are directly related to the reduction in the average Medicare length of stay and per admissions costs.

Unfortunately, the increase in costs for seniors and disabled beneficiaries has not resulted in an increase in quality of care. I am increasingly alarmed by suggestions that hospitals and physicians may be sacrificing patient care in an effort to contain costs under this new system. It is appalling that we are hearing reports of such unethical practices as prematurely discharging patients and reedmitting them later, and failing to hospitalize patients with complex medical problems. Actions like these, in an attempt to squeeze a few extra dollars out of the DRG system are disgraceful and must be stopped. I believe S. 2331 is an important step in our efforts to assure that our Nation's strong tradition of providing quality health services to our Medicare beneficiaries will not be jeopardized.

I hope all of my colleagues will join with us in supporting S. 2331 and in other efforts to guarantee that our Nation's Medicare beneficiaries receive the best possible care that is available.●

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague, Senator HEINZ, and several other Members from both sides of the aisle in introducing the "Medicare Quality Protection Act of 1986." Just as prospective payment was a critical safeguard for the fiscal integrity of the Medicare Program, the bill we are introducing today will be an important step toward improving safeguards of the quality of care that is delivered under that program.

The aspect of the bill that I am most pleased with is that it mandates explicity that the Secretary of Health and Human Services thoroughly assess the effects of PPS on access and quality of care for Medicare beneficiaries.

It's time to stop talking about "anecdotal evidence" of problems under PPS and get the data. The General Accounting Office reported a lack of data on quality and access under PPS that cannot be ignored. This bill sets up the mechanisms we need to find out what is really happening.

Every new payment reform may have side effects. Retrospective cost-based reimbursement had inherent incentives to provide more and more services, perhaps even to the detriment of patients. Prospective payment has the opposite incentive—it may lead to underservice if not appropriately administered.

In order to set up quality safeguards which are tailored for a changing payment environment, I led a push to restructure the PSRO program to create Peer Review Organizations, or PRO's. This program has more flexibility to respond to the monitoring needs that arise under PPS.

PRO's are trying, but they're going to need help. We will have to go further than to call for expansions in their contractual responsibilities in S. 2331. We also must see that they get more timely cooperation from the Department of Health and Human Services in issuing regulations and sharing nationwide data essential to PRO operations. And we must see that they get sufficient funding to meet their scope of work. The PRO contract must be reasonable, not HCFA's wish list.

Those are concerns that I will be pursuing in the coming months.

What else can we do to assure that quality care is provided under PPS? Set appropriate payment rates. The bill we are introducing will require the HHS Secretary to report to Congress with a severity-of-illness adjustment. This will improve the accuracy and adequacy of DRG payments to hospitals, and this is essential.

But the most important piece of this bill is its plan for providing beneficiaries with better information about rights under PPS and easier access to PRO's when they feel those rights have been violated.

I am concerned with the reports we've received of hospital administrators telling beneficiaries that after so many days per DRG, their Medicare coverage is up. Hospitals have a responsibility to provide appropriate treatment whether that takes the average length of stay per DRG or 10 days longer. The best way to protect beneficiaries from this kind of abuse of the system is to arm them with the facts about their Medicare coverage. This bill will do that.

I am also concerned, however, with all the negative, dramatic press which characterizes PPS as a social experiment that is hurting the seniors. PPS has contributed to the solvency of the health insurance trust fund, it has encouraged better management, and that is no experiment. It is characterizations like that which do a real disservice to Medicare beneficiaries. The best protection a Medicare beneficiary—or any health care consumer—can have is full information about his health care program and his rights under that program.

The goal of the prospective payment system, and of the health care reform still to come, is to introduce competition and consumer choice into the health care market, to have providers compete for patients by offering economical, quality care.

This will require health care consumers to get involved, to become fully informed about their options for health care, and to take responsibility for demanding value at a fair price. This is the only way to make sure they get both economy and quality.

Medicare beneficiaries do not have to feel helpless and victimized. If they have the information, they can make decisions.

I believe this bill is a step toward halting that counterproductive hysteria. It is a step toward recognizing that well-informed health care consumers are the best police of the quality of care provided. For that reason, I have given it my support.

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ (for himself, Mr. BOREN, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. ABDNOR, and Mr. GRASSLEY):

S. 2332. A bill to provide credit assistance to borrowers of loans made by commercial lending institutions, and the Farmers Home Administration, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

FARM CREDIT ASSISTANCE ACT

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BOSCHWITZ], in introducing today the Farm Credit Assistance Act of 1986. This legislation is a revised version of a bill Senator BOSCHWITZ and I introduced last fall and attempted to include in the Farm Credit Act Amendments of 1985. Since December, we have been working on our bill in an attempt to make it more acceptable to all parties concerned.

In addition to making the interest rate buy-down provisions of the bill more palatable, we have also incorporated provisions of a bill introduced by Senator NICKLES which requires the Farm Credit System to restructure loans when it is cheaper to restructure than to foreclose.

There is no question that the farmers and ranchers of this country are facing difficult times. During 1985, farm income fell approximately 20 percent. After adjusting for inflation, net farm income in 1985 was $11 billion. Ten years ago, net farm income was over $20 billion. Net farm income is expected to decline again this year by about 8 percent in 1986, bringing the 1981–86 decline in inflation-adjusted net farm income to about 33 percent. On average, Oklahoma farmers did not generate enough income from the farm in the past 2 years to cover operating expenses.

Nominal land values fell an unprecedented 13 percent in 1984 and approximately 8 percent in 1985, the fourth consecutive year of declining land values. From 1981 to 1986, farm real estate values, in real terms, will have dropped by approximately 34 percent. In some counties, land values have fallen more than 50 percent in the past 3 or 4 years. By the end of 1986, it is estimated that cumulative farm sector equity losses since 1981 could exceed $250 billion—more than a fourth of peak values.

Low income combined with falling land values have placed many farmers in a difficult financial position; 20 percent of all farms are experiencing financial stress and an additional 10 percent are considered potentially at risk because of high debt loads; 123,000 farms are highly leveraged and technically insolvent and 51,000 operators had debt-to-asset ratios over 100 percent. Approximately 62 percent of all farm debt, amounting to $123 billion, is held by borrowers with debt-to-asset ratios over 40 percent.

The farm situation has deteriorated to the point that the survival of many banks in the Nation is being questioned. Agricultural banks accounted for more than one-half of the 118 commercial banks that failed in 1985. The percentage of bank failures that are agricultural increased dramatically from 15.9 percent in 1983 to 59.5 percent in the first 10 months of 1985. The number of potentially vulnerable commercial agricultural banks rose from 96 to 302 during the past 3 years. In June 1983, there were 106 problem agricultural banks; by October 1985, there were 413.

Mr. President, the condition of the agricultural economy does not merely affect farmers and their lenders. Agriculture is the largest sector of the American economy. Agriculture accounts for 20 percent of the Nation's gross national product, with $610 billion of business activity yearly. Each additional $1 billion of farm demand creates 35,000 jobs and adds a total of $2 billion to the Nation's gross national product.

In 1981, there were 1.1 million full-time jobs in the United States related to agricultural exports alone; 151,680 jobs in the printing and publishing industry is dependent upon agriculture; 543,480 jobs in the transportation and warehousing industry are dependent upon agriculture. The meat and poultry industry, alone, employs 347,000 people. Farmers annually spend $10 billion for tractors and other equipment; $7 billion for fuel and oil; and $9 billion for fertilizer and lime. In iron and steel manufacturing 93,176 jobs are dependent upon agriculture; 37 percent of all jobs in the glass and glass products industry are dependent upon agriculture; and 69 percent of all jobs the metal containers industry are dependent upon agriculture.

As should be obvious, everyone in this country has a stake in agriculture and retaining its viability. The legislation we are introducing today is not going to save every American farmer. It is not a complete solution by any means. Yet, it does take a step in the right direction.

Our legislation establishes an interest rate buy-down program that will help many American farmers by reducing their interest cost. Interest payments, alone, make up approximately 20 percent of farmers total production cost. The Agricultural Loan Interest Subsidy Program [AGLIS] will reduce the interest rate on agricultural loans by 3 to 5 percent; 2 percentage points will be paid by the Federal Government; an optional 1 to 2 percentage points may be paid by the States; and 1 percentage point by the lender. The lender can write off 15 percent of the principal of the loan in lieu of paying 1 percent of the interest.

In addition to establishing an interest rate buy-down program, the Farm Credit Assistance Act requires the Farm Credit System and the Farmers Home Admninistration to restructure loans instead of foreclosing on them in instances where it is actually cheaper to restructure than to foreclose. I want to point out that this will not mean that everyone who has a Farm Credit System [FCS] or FmHA loan will be able to avoid foreclosure. Restructuring is required only when it is actually cheaper for the FCS or the FmHA. In this way, losses for the FCS and the FmHA will be minimized. For the FCS, this should result in lower interest cost for all borrowers of the system.

Our legislation also encourages the Farm Credit System to allow borrowers who will be foreclosed on to retain possession and occupancy of the principal residence of the borrower. Presently, the FCS has not been very willing at all to allow a borrower to continue to reside, even on a temporary basis, in the borrower's residence.

At the present time, there are no regulations for the disposition of property acquired by the Farm Credit System. The FCS, in essence, can do about anything with the land. In fact, a current policy of the Wichita Farm Credit district is to not allow a previous owner of the land to purchase his homestead. A couple of months ago, a farmer in Oklahoma was foreclosed on by the Farm Credit System. The Farm Credit System held an auction of the farmer's land. The farmer was able to raise enough money from his friends and neighbors to make a bid to purchase his homestead. While the bid was higher than the actual market value of the land and was the only bid, the Farm Credit System would not permit the farmer to pay cash for the land. I enquired of the officials of the Wichita Farm Credit banks about this matter. I was informed that the bank had a policy of not permitting a previous owner to purchase the land. I was shocked. The legislation we are introducing today will change this policy and will require the Farm Credit System to give special consideration to previous owners in the selling or leasing of land acquired by the System.

Another problem we have encountered in the past couple of years is the Farm Credit System's refusal to provide borrowers copies of the appraisals of the assets of the borrowers. In one case, a farmer was told that the System had cut the value of his assets in half but would not provide him with a copy of the appraisals. It is certainly hard to argue that the appraisals were too low or inaccurate if one does not have a copy of the appraisal. Our legislation requires the Farm Credit System to provide copies of the appraisals to the borrowers.

The Farm Credit Assistance Act also prevents the Farm Credit System from requiring additional collateral or foreclosing on a borrower for failure to provide additional collateral if the borrower is current in the payment of interest or principal. Right now, the Farm Credit System is foreclosing on borrowers who are completely current on their payments. Though it seems ridiculous, the FCS is doing this. A couple of months ago, the FCS called an Oklahoma farmer and told him he would have to provide additional collateral for his loan or else the system would initiate foreclosure proceedings. As with many farmers, this particular farmer did not have any additional collateral to give the FCS. Consequently, even though he was completely current on his payments. The FCS foreclosed on him a couple of weeks ago.

The legislation we are introducing today will also prohibit the Farm Credit System from increasing the interest rate on a loan that has been classified. An anomaly of current FCS policy is to increase the interest rate for a borrower the more he has difficulty meeting his payments. A couple of weeks ago, a farmer called my office to report what had happened to him in this regard. First, he was 10 days late in making his payment to the Federal Land Bank. He made his payment, in full, but because he was 10 days late the Federal Land Bank raised his interest rate by 2 percentage points. When the System raised his interest rate, it resulted in a substantial increase in his payment, to the point that the farmer would barely be able to make his next payment. Because he would now be using a larger percentage of his cashflow for his payment, the System classified his loan as a problem loan and raised his interest rate an additional 2 percent. With the additional 2 percent increase in interest costs, the borrower is completely unable to have full payment and is now being threatened with foreclosure by the System. It does seem illogical, Mr. President, but this is the way the FCS is operating.

Mr. President, we must change the current policies of the Farm Credit System. The current policies are driving down land values and jeopardizing the economic position of every farmer and rancher in this country. In turn, as more and more farmers are going out of business, more banks are going down. The entire economy is beginning to feel the effects of the problems confronting our Nation's farmers and ranchers.

As I have said, this legislation is not going to keep every farmer in business, but it is a beginning. I urge my colleagues to support the timely passage of this legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that an explanation and the text of the Farm Credit Assistance Act of 1986 be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2332

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SEC. 2. GENERAL DEFINITIONS.

As used in this Act:

(1) INSTITUTION.—The term "institution" means an institution of the Farm Credit

System described in section 1.2 of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 (12 U.S.C. 2002).

(2) INTEREST SUBSIDY PROGRAM.—The term "interest subsidy program" means the Federal-State-Lender cooperative agricultural loan interest subsidy program established under title I.

(3) FCS LOAN RESTRUCTURING PROGRAM.—The term "FCS loan restructuring program" means the restructuring program established under subtitle A of title II for loans made by institutions of the Farm Credit System.

(4) SECRETARY.—The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Agriculture.

(5) STATE.—The term "State" means each of the 50 States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands of the United States, American Samoa, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, or (to extent the Secretary determines it is feasible and appropriate) the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

(6) STATE AGENCY.—The term "State agency" means the agency designated by a State under section 106(b)(1) to carry out the interest subsidy program in the State.

TITLE I—AGRICULTURAL LOAN INTEREST SUBSIDY PROGRAM

SEC. 101. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this title:

(1) BORROWER.—The term "borrower" means a person who meets the eligibility criteria prescribed in section 103.

(2) LENDER.—The term "lender" means a commercial bank, savings and loan association, credit union, insurance company, or institution, including a subsidiary or affiliate thereof, that—

(A) has agreed to participate in the interest subsidy program; and

(B) has been approved for participation in the interest subsidy program by the appropriate State agency.

SEC. 102. ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subject to subsection (b) and the availability of funds provided pursuant to section 403, the Secretary shall establish a Federal-State-Lender cooperative agricultural loan interest subsidy program under which, at the request of a State, borrowers and lenders within the State may participate in the interest subsidy program in accordance with this title.

(b) CONSULTATION.—The Secretary shall establish the interest subsidy program in consultation and cooperation with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, the Chairman of the Farm Credit Administration, the Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and each State agency.

SEC. 103. ELIGIBILITY FOR ASSISTANCE.

To be eligible to receive assistance under this title, a person must—

(1) be an individual, family corporation, or family partnership;

(2) be a borrower of a loan made by a lender for agricultural purposes that is outstanding on April 1, 1986;

(3) during the period beginning on the date of the approval of a State plan under section 106 and ending September 30, 1987—

(A) be delinquent in the payment of principal or interest, or both, on the loan; or

(B) demonstrate to the lender that, due to circumstances beyond the control of the borrower (including depressed land values, high interest rates, and low prices for agricultural commodities), the borrower will be temporarily unable, without assistance provided under this Act, to continue making payments of the principal and interest when due without unduly impairing the standard of living of the borrower;

(4) have derived at least 50 percent of the gross annual income of the borrower from the production of raw agricultural products, including livestock, poultry, or the products of aquaculture, during at least 3 of the 5 preceding taxable years;

(5) have had gross annual sales of agricultural commodities of at least $30,000 during at least 3 of the 5 preceding taxable years;

(6) have a debt to asset ratio of at least 40 percent;

(7) have an ability to repay the loan, based on past performance as a capable producer and assistance to be provided under this Act; and

(8) not produce an agricultural commodity on highly erodible land or converted wetland in violation of section 1211 or 1221 of the Food Security Act of 1985 (16 U.S.C. 3811 or 3821).

SEC. 104. INTEREST SUBSIDIES.

(a) APPLICATIONS.—During the period beginning on the date of the approval of a State plan by the Secretary under section 106 and ending September 30, 1987, a borrower may apply to a lender for an interest subsidy for any agricultural loan made by the lender to the borrower that is outstanding on April 1, 1986.

(b) INTEREST SUBSIDIES.—If a borrower of a loan applies to a lender for an interest subsidy in accordance with subsection (a), the lender determines that the borrower meets the eligibility criteria prescribed in section 103, and the lender agrees to participate in the interest subsidy program, subject to this section, not later than 90 days after receipt of the application, the loan shall be restructured in such a manner that the interest rate payable by the borrower shall be fixed for a period of 3 years or the remaining term of the loan, whichever is less, at a rate equal to the interest rate of the loan on April 1, 1986, less up to 5 percentage points.

(c) PAYMENT OF SUBSIDIES.—If an interest subsidy is provided for a loan made by a lender to a borrower in a State—

(1) the Secretary shall pay 2 percentage points of the subsidy by making payments through the State agency to the lender;

(2) if the State elects to make such payments, the State may pay not less than 1 percentage point and not more than 2 percentage points of the subsidy by making payments to the lender; and

(3) the lender shall—

(A) pay 1 percentage point of the subsidy; or

(B) cancel at least 15 percent of the principal due on the loan.

(d) TERM OF LOAN.—The term of any loan for which an interest subsidy is provided under this section shall not be less than the term of the loan outstanding before the subsidy is provided.

(e) SCHEDULE OF PAYMENTS.—The schedule of payments on a restructured loan shall be established in accordance with the ability of the borrower to repay the loan.

(f) ACCRUED INTEREST.—Interest accrued on a restructured loan prior to restructuring shall not be capitalized but shall be paid by the borrower to the lender prior to any retirement of principal under the loan as restructured in accordance with this title.

(g) REPAYMENT.—Any balance of principal and interest outstanding on any restructured loan shall be repaid at a rate that is agreed on by the lender and borrower, except that the rate of interest on the loan may not exceed the standard rate charged by the lender on loans with comparable maturities for similar purposes at the time the loan is restructured.

(h) MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF ASSISTANCE.—The aggregate outstanding amount of loan principal for which an interest subsidy may be provided under this title may not exceed—

(1) in the case of a loan made to an individual, $400,000; and

(2) in the case of a loan made to a family corporation or family partnership, $600,000.

SEC. 105. PAYMENTS TO STATES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—From sums available pursuant to section 403 and subject to subsection (b) and section 106, the Secretary shall pay to each State for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1986, through September 30, 1989, an amount equal to the sum of—

(1) the amount necessary to finance the share of interest subsidies provided to borrowers residing in the State that is required to be paid by the Secretary under section 104(c)(1); and

(2) 100 percent of the administrative expenses that are incurred by the State agency in carrying out this title and are approved by the Secretary.

(b) MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF PAYMENTS.—The aggregate amount of payments paid by the Secretary to States under subsection (a) for a fiscal year may not exceed $600,000,000.

SEC. 106. STATE PLANS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—To be eligible to participate in the interest subsidy program during a fiscal year, a State must—

(1) submit a plan to the Secretary for the fiscal year; and

(2) receive the approval of the Secretary for the plan.

(b) PLAN REQUIREMENTS.—To receive the approval of the Secretary for a plan, a State must submit a plan that—

(1) designates a single agency that shall be responsible for the administration, or the supervision of the administration, of the interest subsidy program in the State;

(2) assesses the interest subsidy needs of borrowers residing in the State;

(3) describes the interest subsidy program established in the State (including any agencies designated to provide a subsidy under such program), which program must meet such requirements as the Secretary may prescribe;

(4) estimates the amount of funds necessary to provide interest subsidies under the program and related administrative expenses, except that such amount may not exceed the amount allocated by the Secretary for payment to the State out of the total amount available for payment under section 105;

(5) requires any lender participating in the interest subsidy program to provide to any borrower who is delinquent in the payment of principal or interest, or both, due on a loan during the period referred to in section 104(a) prompt written notice that describes the assistance available under this title and any deadlines for application for the assistance; and

(6) includes such other information as the Secretary may require.

(c) APPROVAL OF PLANS.—(1) The Secretary shall approve or disapprove a plan submitted by a State under subsection (b) not later than 45 days after the State submits the plan.

(2) The Secretary shall approve any plan that complies with subsection (b).

(d) AUDITS.—(1) Each State agency shall—

(A) provide for an annual audit of expenditures made by the State agency in carrying out the interest subsidy program, not later than 60 days after the end of each year in which the program is conducted; and

(B) promptly report to the Secretary the findings of such audit.

(2) Not later than 60 days after the end of each year in which a State agency participates in the interest subsidy program, a State agency shall provide the Secretary with a statement that provides—

(A) a description of whether (and, if so, by how much) the payments received under section 105 for such year exceeded the expenditures by the State agency during such year; and

(B) such other information as the Secretary may require.

(e) DENIAL OR WITHHOLDING OF PAYMENTS.—(1) If the Secretary finds that a State has failed to comply with subsection (b) or (d) during a fiscal year, except as provided in paragraph (2), the Secretary shall—

(A) notify the appropriate State agency that payments will not be made to the State agency under section 105 for the year until the Secretary is satisfied that the State is complying with such subsection; and

(B) make no payments under section 105 until the Secretary is satisfied that the State is complying with such subsection.

(2) If the Secretary finds that a State has failed to comply with subsection (b) or (d) during a fiscal year, the Secretary may—

(A) suspend the denial of payments under paragraph (1) for such period as the Secretary determines is appropriate; and

(B) withhold payments of approved State administrative expenses incurred in providing assistance under the plan, in whole or in part, for the year, until the Secretary is satisfied that the State is complying with such subsection, at which time such withheld payments shall be paid.

(3) If the Secretary finds that a State has substantially failed to comply with subsection (b) or (d), the Secretary may, in addition to or in lieu of any action taken under paragraph (1) or (2), refer the matter to the Attorney General with a request that the Attorney General seek injunctive relief to require compliance by the State. If the Attorney General brings a suit in an appropriate district court of the United States and makes a showing of substantial noncompliance, appropriate injunctive relief shall issue.

SEC. 107. REVIEW BY SECRETARY AND STATE AGENCIES.

(a) REVIEW AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE BY SECRETARY.—The Secretary—

(1) shall provide for review, and may provide for an audit, of the manner in which the interest subsidy program is carried out in a State; and

(2) may provide to States technical assistance in carrying out the program.

(b) REVIEW BY STATE AGENCIES.—A State agency may monitor the compliance of a lender with this title. Any lender that violates this title shall be ineligible to receive further payments under this title.

SEC. 108. NOTICE AND DETERMINATIONS OF ASSISTANCE.

A lender in a State participating in the interest subsidy program may not take any action as the result of a borrower defaulting on an outstanding loan made by such lender to a borrower unless the lender has—

(1) provided the borrower with the notice required under section 106(b)(5); and

(2) in the case of a borrower who has applied for assistance under this title, determined that the borrower does not meet the eligibility criteria prescribed in section 103.

SEC. 109. ASSISTANCE OF FEDERAL AND STATE AGENCIES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—To make assistance under this title available expeditiously and in a consistent and uninterrupted manner, the Secretary shall—

(1) use such funds, personnel, and facilities of the Department of Agriculture (including the Commodity Credit Corporation) as the Secretary considers necessary to carry out this title; and

(2) request other Federal or State agency to provide such funds, personnel, and facilities as the Secretary considers necessary to carry out this title.

(b) REIMBURSEMENT.—Any agency that provides advanced funds, personnel, or facilities under subsection (a) shall be fully reimbursed for such assistance as soon as is practicable from subsequent appropriations.

SEC. 110. PROGRAM INELIGIBILITY FOR PRODUCTION ON HIGHLY ERODIBLE LAND OR CONVERTED WETLAND.

(a) HIGHLY ERODIBLE LAND CONSERVATION.—Section 1211 of the Food Security Act of 1985 (16 U.S.C. 3811) is amended—

(1) by striking out "or" at the end of paragraph (1);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) an interest subsidy during such crop year under the interest subsidy program established under title I of the Farm Credit Assistance Act of 1986.".

(b) WETLAND CONSERVATION.—Section 1221 of the Food Security Act of 1985 (16 U.S.C. 3821) is amended—

(1) by striking out "or" at the end of paragraph (1);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) an interest subsidy during such crop year under the interest subsidy program established under title I of the Farm Credit Assistance Act of 1986.".

TITLE II—FARM CREDIT SYSTEM INSTITUTION BORROWERS

Subtitle A—Farm Credit System Loan Restructuring Program

SEC. 201. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this subtitle:

(1) BORROWER.—The term "borrower" means a borrower of a loan made by an institution.

(2) CAPITAL CORPORATION.—The term "Capital Corporation" means the Farm Credit System Capital Corporation established under section 4.28A of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 (12 U.S.C. 2216).

(3) CHAIRMAN.—The term "Chairman" means the Chairman of the Farm Credit Administration Board designated under section 5.8(a) of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 (12 U.S.C. 2242(a)).

(4) COMMITTEE.—The term "committee" means a credit review committee selected from and by—

(A) the local board of directors of the institution from which a loan originated; or

(B) in the case of consolidated or merged institutions, members of a local advisory board elected by the stockholders served by the merged or consolidated institutions from which a loan originated.

(5) COST OF FORECLOSURE.—The term "cost of foreclosure" includes—

(A) the difference between the outstanding amount of principal due on a loan made by an institution and the value of collateral used to secure the loan, taking into consideration the lien position of the institution;

(B) the estimated cost of maintaining a loan as a nonperforming asset;

(C) the estimated cost of administrative and legal actions necessary to foreclose a loan and dispose of property acquired as the result of the foreclosure;

(D) the estimated, adverse impact of the sale of property acquired as the result of a loan foreclosure on the value of property held by other borrowers of institutions;

(E) the estimated cost of changes in the value of collateral used to secure a loan during the period beginning on the date of the initiation of action to foreclose or liquidate the loan and ending on the date of the disposition of the collateral; and

(F) all other costs incurred as the result of the foreclosure or liquidation of a loan.

(6) LOAN.—The term "loan" means a loan made by an institution under the Farm Credit Act of 1971 (12 U.S.C. 2001 et seq.).

SEC. 202. ELIGIBILITY FOR ASSISTANCE.

To be eligible to receive assistance under this subtitle, a person must—

(1) be an individual, family corporation, or family partnership;

(2) be a borrower of a loan made by, and a stockholder of, an institution who is delinquent in the payment of principal or interest, or both, on the loan on the date of enactment of this Act or during the 3-year period beginning on such date;

(3) demonstrate to the institution that, due to circumstances beyond the control of the borrower (including depressed land values, high interest rates, and low prices for agricultural commodities), the borrower is temporarily unable to continue making payments of the principal and interest when due without unduly impairing the standard of living of the borrower;

(4) have derived at least 50 percent of the gross annual income of the borrower from the production of raw agricultural products, including livestock, poultry, or the products of aquaculture, during at least 3 of the 5 preceding taxable years;

(5) have had gross annual sales of agricultural commodities of at least $30,000 during at least 3 of the 5 preceding taxable years; and

(6) have an ability to repay the loan, based on past performance as a capable producer and assistance provided under this Act.

SEC. 203. LOAN DETERMINATIONS.

Before instituting a proceeding to foreclose a loan made to a borrower, an institution must determine—

(1) the cost of foreclosure; and

(2) the cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this subtitle.

SEC. 204. LOAN FORECLOSURE AND RESTRUCTURING.

If an institution determines that the cost of foreclosure of a loan made to a borrower is equal to or exceeds the cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this subtitle, in lieu of foreclosure, the institution shall reduce the principal or interest, or both, due on the loan, or otherwise restructure the loan, in a manner that would enable the borrower to make payments of principal and interest due on the loan without unduly impairing the standard of living of the borrower.

SEC. 205. ADDITIONAL COLLATERAL.

An institution may not—

(1) require any borrower to provide additional collateral to secure a loan if the borrower is current in the payment of principal or interest on the loan; or

(2) bring any action to foreclose on, or otherwise liquidate, any loan as the result of the failure of a borrower to provide additional collateral to secure a loan if the borrower was current in the payment of principal or interest on the loan at the time the additional collateral was required.

SEC. 206. APPEALS.

(a) DETERMINATION OF INELIGIBILITY.—(1) If an institution determines that a person does not meet the eligibility criteria prescribed in section 202, not later than 15 days after such determination, the institution shall provide the person with a written notice of—

(A) the determination and the reasons for the determination; and

(B) the right of the person to appeal the determination before a committee.

(2) If a person makes a written request to a committee not later than 30 days after receipt of a notice to contest a determination referred to in paragraph (1), the person shall have the right to appear before the committee to contest the determination.

(b) DETERMINATION TO NOT RESTRUCTURE.—(1) If an institution determines that the cost of restructuring a loan in accordance with this subtitle exceeds the cost of foreclosure of the loan, not later than 15 days after such determination, the institution shall provide the borrower of the loan with a written notice of—

(A) the determination and the reasons for the determination;

(B) the computations used by the institution to make the determination, including the estimate of the collateral value of the land used to secure the loan; and

(C) the right of the borrower to appeal the determination before a committee.

(2) If a borrower of a loan made by an institution makes a written request to a committee not later than 30 days after receipt of a notice to contest a determination referred to in paragraph (1), the borrower shall have the right to—

(A) request the committee to arrange an independent appraisal of the cost of foreclosure of the loan and the cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this subtitle; and

(B) appear before the committee to contest the determination.

(3) If a borrower requests a committee to arrange an independent appraisal made under paragraph (2)(A), the committee shall—

(A) arrange the independent appraisal, in accordance with regulations issued by the Farm Credit Administration; and

(B) consider such appraisal when reviewing the determination of the committee.

(4) If an independent appraisal is conducted under this subsection of the cost of foreclosure of a loan made by an institution to a borrower and the cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this subtitle, the cost of the appraisal shall be borne by—

(A) the institution if the appraised cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this subtitle is equal to or less than the appraised cost of the foreclosure of the loan; or

(B) the borrower if the appraised cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this subtitle is greater than the appraised cost of the foreclosure of the loan.

(c) DETERMINATION TO RESTRUCTURE.—(1) If an institution determines that a borrower of a loan meets the eligibility criteria prescribed in section 202 and that the cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this subtitle is less than or equal to the cost of foreclosure of the loan, not later than 15 days after such determination, the institution shall provide the borrower with a written notice of—

(A) the determination and the reasons for the determination;

(B) the amount of the reduction in principal or interest, or both, or method of restructuring, the institution determines is adequate to enable the borrower to make payments in accordance with section 204; and

(C) the right of the borrower to contest the amount of the reduction, or method of restructuring, before a committee.

(2) If a borrower makes a written request to a committee not later than 30 days after receipt of a notice to contest the amount of the reduction, or method of restructuring, referred to in paragraph (1), the borrower shall have the right to appear before the committee to contest the amount of the reduction or method of restructuring.

(d) VOLUNTARY AGREEMENTS.—A borrower of a loan made by an institution shall have the right to appear before a committee to contest a determination, amount, or action under this subtitle if—

(1) the institution and the borrower enter into an agreement under which the institution agrees to restructure the loan in accordance with this subtitle and the borrower agrees not to contest the determination, amount, or action, as the case may be;

(2) the institution does not restructure the loan in accordance with this subtitle; and

(3) the borrower makes a written request to the committee to contest the determination, amount, or action, as the case may be, not later than 30 days after the date by which the institution agreed to restructure the loan in accordance with this subtitle.

(e) NOTICE OF DECISIONS.—Not later than 15 days after any review conducted by a committee, the committee shall provide the aggrieved person or borrower with written notice of the decision of the committee and the reasons for the decision.

SEC. 207. REIMBURSEMENT FOR PRINCIPAL REDUCTION.

The Capital Corporation shall reimburse an institution for the amount of principal due on loans that is reduced by the institution under section 204 if the Chairman determines that such action is necessary to avoid the liquidation or insolvency of the institution.

SEC. 208. REPORT.

Not later than 270 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Chairman shall submit a report to Congress on the operation of this subtitle, including—

(1) an analysis of the impact of actions taken under this subtitle on losses suffered by institutions;

(2) an analysis of the impact of the actions on property values;

(3) an analysis of the accuracy of the cost of foreclosure determined by institutions under this subtitle;

(4) the number and amount of loans restructured in accordance with this subtitle;

(5) the number of current and estimated future delinquencies before and after the expiration of this subtitle on loans made to borrowers; and

(6) the recommendations of the Chairman concerning reauthorization of this subtitle.

Subtitle B—Farm Credit System Reform

SEC. 211. ACCESS TO APPRAISALS.

Section 4.13A of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 (12 U.S.C. 2200) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4.13A. ACCESS TO DOCUMENTS AND INFORMATION.—In accordance with regulations of the Farm Credit Administration, a System institution shall provide to each borrower of such institution—

"(1) at the time of execution of a loan, a copy of each document signed by the borrower;

"(2) at any time thereafter, on request, a copy of each document signed or delivered by the borrower;

"(3) at any time, on request, a copy of the articles of incorporation or charter and bylaws of the institution; and

"(4) at the time of execution of a loan and at any time thereafter, on request, a copy of each appraisal of the assets of the borrower.".

SEC. 212. HOMESTEAD PROTECTION.

Part C of title IV of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 is amended by adding after section 4.20 (12 U.S.C. 2208) the following new section:

"SEC. 4.21. HOMESTEAD PROTECTION.—If an institution forecloses a loan made by the institution or a borrower of a loan made by the institution declares bankruptcy or goes into voluntary liquidation to avoid foreclosure or bankruptcy, the institution is encouraged to permit the borrower to retain possession and occupancy of the principal residence of the borrower, and a reasonable amount of adjoining land, to maintain the family of the borrower.".

SEC. 213. INTEREST RATES ON CLASSIFIED LOANS.

Part C of title IV of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 is amended by adding after section 4.22 (as added by section 212) the following new section:

"SEC. 4.22. An institution of the Farm Credit System may not increase the interest rate on a loan made to a borrower that is outstanding on the date of enactment of the Farm Credit Assistance Act of 1986 as the result of the loan been classified as a risk or problem loan.".

SEC. 214. CERTIFICATION OF NEED FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE.

Section 4.28J of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 (12 U.S.C. 2216i) is amended by inserting after "TREASURY.—" the following new sentence: "Not later than 60 days after the date of enactment of the Farm Credit Assistance Act of 1986, and each 90 days thereafter, the Farm Credit Administration shall determine whether the Farm Credit System is in need of financial assistance to address financial stress of System institutions.".

SEC. 215. OPERATING EXPENSES OF INSTITUTIONS.

Part D1 of title IV of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 is amended by adding after section 4.28L (12 U.S.C. 2216k) the following new section:

"SEC. 4.28M. OPERATING EXPENSES OF INSTITUTIONS.—During the period beginning on date of enactment of the the Farm Credit Assistance Act of 1986 and ending the later of September 30, 1990, or such time as the Secretary of the Treasury no longer holds any obligations issued by the Capital Corporation, the operating expenses of an institution of the Farm Credit System may not exceed the average cost of bonds issued by the System, plus 1 percent.".

SEC. 216. DISPOSITION AND LEASING OF FARMLAND.

Part F of title IV of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 is amended by adding after section 4.36 (12 U.S.C. 2219a) the following new section:

"SEC. 4.37. DISPOSITION AND LEASING OF FARMLAND.—(a) The Farm Credit Administration shall issue regulations for the disposition and leasing of farmland acquired by any institution of the Farm Credit System, including the Capital Corporation, (hereafter in this section referred to as an 'institution') in accordance with this section.

"(b) An institution shall to the extent practicable sell or lease farmland acquired under this Act in the following order of priority:

"(1) Sale of such farmland to operators (as of the time immediately before such sale) of not larger than family-size farms.

"(2) Lease of such farmland to operators (as of the time immediately before such lease is entered into) of not larger than family-size farms.

"(c)(1) An institution shall not offer for sale or sell any such farmland if the placing of such farmland on the market will have a detrimental effect on the value of farmland in the area.

"(2) In selling such land, the institution shall give special consideration to a previous owner or operator of such land.

"(d)(1) An institution shall consider granting, and may grant, to an operator of not larger than a family-size farm, in conjunction with subsection (e), a lease with an option to purchase farmland acquired under this Act.

"(2) The Farm Credit Administration shall issue regulations providing for leasing such land, or leasing such land with an option to purchase, on a fair and equitable basis.

"(3) In leasing such land, the institution shall give special consideration to a previous owner or operator of such land if such owner or operator has financial resources, and farm management skills and experience, that the institution determines are sufficient to assure a reasonable prospect of success in the proposed farming operation.

"(4) To the extent an institution may lease or operate real property under this section, the institution shall, if the institution determines to administer such property through management contracts, offer the contracts on a competitive bid basis, giving preference to persons who will live in, and own and operate qualified small businesses in, the area where the property is located.

"(e)(1) An institution shall offer such land for sale to operators of not larger than family-size farms at a price that reflects the average annual income that may be reasonably anticipated to be generated from farming such land.

"(2) If two or more qualified operators of not larger than family-size farms desire to purchase, or lease with an option to purchase, such land, the local board of the institution shall, by majority vote, select the operator who may purchase such land.

"(f) If farmland is available for disposition under this section, the institution shall—

"(1) publish an announcement of the availability of such farmland in at least one newspaper that is widely circulated in the county in which the farmland is located; and

"(2) post an announcement of the availability of such farmland in a prominent place in the local office of the institution that serves the county in which the farmland is located.".

SEC. 217. STOCK PURCHASE REQUIREMENT.

Part F of title IV of the Farm Credit Act of 1971 is amended by adding after section 4.37 (as added by section 216) the following new section:

"SEC. 4.38. STOCK PURCHASE REQUIREMENT.—A borrower must purchase stock in the Farm Credit System, in accordance with regulations issued by the Farm Credit Administration, to be eligible—

"(1) to obtain a loan from an institution of the Farm Credit System; or

"(2) to enter into an installment contract for the purchase of farmland acquired by the Farm Credit System.".

TITLE III—FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION BORROWERS

SEC. 301. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this title

(1) BORROWER.—The term "borrower" means a borrower of a loan who meets the eligibility criteria prescribed in section 302.

(2) COMMITTEE.—The term "committee" means the appropriate county committee established under section 332 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1982).

(3) COST OF FORECLOSURE.—The term "cost of foreclosure" includes—

(A) the difference between the outstanding amount of principal due on a loan and the value of collateral used to secure the loan, taking into consideration the lien position of the Secretary;

(B) the estimated cost of maintaining a loan as a nonperforming asset;

(C) the estimated cost of administrative and legal actions necessary to foreclose a loan and dispose of property acquired as the result of the foreclosure;

(D) the estimated, adverse impact of the sale of property acquired as the result of a loan foreclosure on the value of property held by other borrowers of the Secretary;

(E) the estimated cost of changes in the value of collateral used to secure a loan during the period beginning on the date of the initiation of action to foreclose or liquidate the loan and the ending on the date of the disposition of the collateral; and

(F) all other costs incurred as the result of the foreclosure or liquidation of a loan.

(4) LOAN.—The term "loan" means a loan made by the Secretary under the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1921 et seq.).

SEC. 302. ELIGIBILITY FOR ASSISTANCE.

To be eligible to receive assistance under this title, a person must—

(1) be an individual, family corporation, or family partnership;

(2) be a borrower of a loan who is delinquent in the payment of principal or interest, or both, on the loan on the date of enactment of this Act or during the 3-year period beginning on such date;

(3) demonstrate to the Secretary that, due to circumstances beyond the control of the borrower (including depressed land values, high interest rates, and low prices for agricultural commodities), the borrower is temporarily unable to continue making payments of the principal and interest when due without unduly impairing the standard of living of the borrower;

(4) have derived at least 50 percent of the gross annual income of the borrower from the production of raw agricultural products, including livestock, poultry, or the products of aquaculture, during at least 3 of the 5 preceding taxable years;

(5) have had gross annual sales of agricultural commodities of at least $30,000 during at least 3 of the 5 preceding taxable years; and

(6) have an ability to repay the loan, based on past performance as a capable producer and assistance provided under this Act.

SEC. 303. LOAN DETERMINATIONS.

Before instituting a proceeding to foreclose a loan made to a borrower, the Secretary must determine—

(1) the cost of foreclosure; and

(2) the cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this title.

SEC. 304. LOAN FORECLOSURE AND RESTRUCTURING.

If the Secretary determines that the cost of foreclosure of a loan made to a borrower is equal to or exceeds the cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this title, in lieu of foreclosure, the Secretary shall reduce the principal or interest, or both, due on the loan, or otherwise restructure the loan, in a manner that would enable the borrower to make payments of principal and interest due on the loan without unduly impairing the standard of living of the borrower.

SEC. 305. ADDITIONAL COLLATERAL.

The Secretary may not—

(1) require any borrower to provide additional collateral to secure a loan if the borrower is current in the payment of interest on the loan; or

(2) bring any action to foreclose on, or otherwise liquidate, any loan as the result of the failure of a borrower to provide additional collateral to secure a loan if the borrower was current in the payment of interest on the loan at the time the additional collateral was required.

SEC. 306. APPEALS.

(a) DETERMINATION OF INELIGIBILITY.—(1) If the Secretary determines that a person does not meet the eligibility criteria prescribed in section 302, not later than 15 days after such determination, the Secretary shall provide the person with a written notice of—

(A) the determination and the reasons for the determination; and

(B) the right of the person to appeal the determination before a committee.

(2) If a person makes a written request to a committee not later than 30 days after receipt of a notice to contest a determination referred to in paragraph (1), the person shall have the right to appear before the committee to contest the determination.

(b) DETERMINATION TO NOT RESTRUCTURE.—(1) If the Secretary determines that the cost of restructuring a loan in accordance with this title exceeds the cost of foreclosure of the loan, not later than 15 days after such determination, the Secretary shall provide the borrower of the loan with a written notice of—

(A) the determination and the reasons for the determination;

(B) the computations used by the Secretary to make the determination, including the estimate of the collateral value of the land used to secure the loan; and

(C) the right of the borrower to appeal the determination before a committee.

(2) If a borrower of a loan made by the Secretary makes a written request to a committee not later than 30 days after receipt of a notice to contest a determination referred to in paragraph (1), the borrower shall have the right to—

(A) request the committee to arrange an independent appraisal of the cost of foreclosure of the loan and the cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this title; and

(B) appear before the committee to contest the determination.

(3) If a borrower requests a committee to arrange an independent appraisal made under paragraph (2)(A), the committee shall—

(A) arrange the independent appraisal, in accordance with regulations issued by the Farm Credit Administration; and

(B) consider such appraisal when reviewing the determination of the committee.

(4) If an independent appraisal is conducted under this subsection of the cost of foreclosure of a loan made by the Secretary to a borrower and the cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this title, the cost of the appraisal shall be borne by—

(A) the Secretary if the appraised cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this title is equal to or less than the appraised cost of the foreclosure of the loan; or

(B) the borrower if the appraised cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this title is greater than the appraised cost of the foreclosure of the loan.

(c) DETERMINATION TO RESTRUCTURE.—(1) If the Secretary determines that a borrower of a loan meets the eligibility criteria prescribed in section 302 and that the cost of restructuring the loan in accordance with this title is less than or equal to the cost of foreclosure of the loan, not later than 15 days after such determination, the Secretary shall provide the borrower with a written notice of—

(A) the determination and the reasons for the determination;

(B) the amount of the reduction in principal or interest, or both, or method of restructuring, the Secretary determines is adequate to enable the borrower to make payments in accordance with section 304; and

(C) the right of the borrower to contest the amount of the reduction, or method of restructuring, before a committee.

(2) If a borrower makes a written request to a committee not later than 30 days after receipt of a notice to contest the amount of the reduction, or the method of restructuring, referred to in paragraph (1), the borrower shall have the right to appear before the committee to contest the amount of the reduction or method of restructuring.

(d) VOLUNTARY AGREEMENTS.—A borrower of a loan made by the Secretary shall have the right to appear before a committee to contest a determination, amount, or action under this title if—

(1) the Secretary and the borrower enter into an agreement under which the Secretary agrees to restructure the loan in accordance with this title and the borrower agrees not to contest the determination, amount, or action, as the case may be;

(2) the Secretary does not restructure the loan in accordance with this title; and

(3) the borrower makes a written request to the committee to contest the determination, amount, or action, as the case may be, not later than 30 days after the date by which the Secretary agreed to restructure the loan in accordance with this title.

(e) NOTICE OF DECISIONS.—Not later than 15 days after any review conducted by a committee, the committee shall provide the aggrieved person or borrower with written notice of the decision of the committee and the reasons for the decision.

SEC. 307. REPORT.

Not later than 270 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall submit a report to Congress on the operation of this title, including—

(1) an analysis of the impact of actions taken under this title on losses suffered by the Secretary;

(2) an analysis of the impact of the actions on property values;

(3) an analysis of the accuracy of the cost of foreclosure determined by the Secretary under this title;

(4) the number and amount of loans restructured in accordance with this title;

(5) the number of current and estimated future delinquencies before and after the expiration of this title on loans made to borrowers; and

(6) the recommendations of the Secretary concerning reauthorization of this title.

SEC. 308. ALTERNATIVE CROP LOAN PROGRAM.

The Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act is amended by inserting after section 352 (7 U.S.C. 2000) the following new section:

"SEC. 353. (a) For purposes of this section, the term 'alternative crop' means any agricultural operation (including acquaculture and livestock production) conducted by an applicant if—

"(1) there is no substantial history of such operation in the area in which the applicant resides; and

"(2) the applicant has derived from such operation not more than 20 percent of the gross annual income of the applicant during any of the 5 preceding taxable years.

"(b) In addition to the purposes prescribed in sections 303 and 312, the Secretary may make and insure, or guarantee, real estate and operating loans under subtitles A and B, respectively, to farmers and ranchers in the United States for the production of alternative crops.

"(c)(1) Subject to paragraph (2), to be eligible to obtain a loan or loan guarantee for a real estate or operating loan for the production of an alternative crop, a person must—

"(A) meet the eligibility requirements prescribed for a real estate loan under section 302 or an operating loan under section 311, respectively; and

"(B) submit to, and receive the approval of, the Secretary for a 5-year plan of projected production and income from the proposed alternative crop.

"(2) In determining eligibility for a loan or loan guarantee under this section, the Secretary shall consider training or farming experience that the Secretary determines is sufficient to assure reasonable prospects of success in the proposed farming operation, whether or not such training or experience is in the production of an alternative crop.

"(d) The Secretary may enter into a multiyear commitment to provide a loan or loan guarantee under this section for a term, of not to exceed 3 years, that is consistent with the nature of the alternative crop operation.".

TITLE IV—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 401. INTER-AGENCY AGRICULTURAL TASK FORCE.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT.—In light of the severe economic problems confronted by many agricultural banks and the regulatory responsibilities of bank regulatory agencies, not later than 30 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Comptroller of the Currency, and the Federal Reserve System shall develop an Inter-Agency Agricultural Task Force to assist commercial agricultural banks and the borrowers of the banks to resolve present economic problems and to facilitate commercial bank lending to agriculture in the future.

(b) DUTIES.—The Inter-Agency Task Force shall—

(1) review existing regulations and policies to facilitate agricultural lending;

(2) cooperate with field office personnel to avoid conflicts and inconsistencies between the agencies; and

(3) consider meaningful alternatives to assist commercial banks in providing agricultural financing through regulatory or statutory changes, including accounting changes, interest rate buy-downs, or other similar methods for assisting banks.

(c) REPORTS.—Not later than 6 months after the date of enactment of this Act, and semiannually thereafter, the Inter-Agency Task Force shall report its findings and recommendations in carrying out this section to—

(1) the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives;

(2) the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry of the Senate;

(3) the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs of the House of Representatives; and

(4) the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs of the Senate.

SEC. 402. REGULATIONS.

Not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary and the Farm Credit Administration shall issue such regulations as are necessary to carry out provisions of this Act under their jurisdiction.

SEC. 403. AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS.

(a) AUTHORIZATION.—There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out this Act.

(b) USE OF INTEREST RATE REDUCTION PROGRAM FUNDS.—Notwithstanding the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1921 et seq.), of the amount of funds used by the Secretary to carry out the interest rate reduction program under section 351(e) of such Act (7 U.S.C. 1999(e)) during the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, the Secretary shall use not less than $30,000,000, and not more than $35,000,000, to carry out the interest subsidy program established under title I during such fiscal year.

SEC. 404. TERMINATION DATE.

Except as otherwise provided in this Act, the authority granted by this Act shall terminate 3 years after the date of enactment of this Act.

FARM CREDIT ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1986
EXPLANATION

TITLE I. INTEREST RATE BUY-DOWN PROGRAM.

1. Each state would have the option of participating in the program. If a State opted into the program, the state would designate an agency to operate the program. 100 percent of the administrative costs would be reimbursed to the states by U.S.D.A. Each state would be required to develop a plan whereby eligible borrowers and lenders would be determined. The plan must be approved by U.S.D.A.

2. Eligible borrowers are those who:

(a) have an outstanding loan on April 1, 1986;

(b)(1) be delinquent in the payment of principal or interest, or both, or (2) demonstrate that the borrower will be unable to make payments of principal or interest;

(c) had gross agricultural sales in excess of $30,000 for three of the past five years;

(d) have derived at least 50 percent of their gross annual income from agriculture in at least 3 of the past 5 taxable years;

(e) have a debt-to-asset ratio in excess of 40 percent;

(f) have repayment ability; and

(g) do not produce an agricultural commodity on highly erodible land or converted wetlands in violation of the sodbuster and swampbuster provisions of the Food Security Act of 1985.

3. Assistance under this program shall be limited to an aggregate amount of principal of not more than $400,000 in the case of an individual, and $600,000 in the case of a family corporation or family partnership.

4. Under the program, for eligible borrowers, the interest rate (or principal as the case may be) will be written down for 3 years as follows:

(a) 2 percentage points will be paid by the federal government;

(b) 1-2 percentage points may be paid by the state; and

(c) 1 percentage point of interest or at least 15 percent of principal by the lender.

5. Eligible lenders under this title are defined as commercial banks and institutions of the farm credit system that have been designated as eligible by the state agency operating the program.

6. Appropriations to carry out the act are authorized as necessary. The CCC can be utilized for carrying out the program.

7. Applications for the interest rate buy-down program will be accepted beginning on the date the U.S.D.A. approves the state plan and ending September 30, 1987.

8. Borrowers who produce on highly erodible land or converted wetlands would be ineligible for benefits under this program.

TITLE II: FARM CREDIT SYSTEM

1. For the period beginning on the date the U.S.D.A. approves a state plan for the interest rate buy-down program and ending September 30, 1987, the Farm Credit System cannot foreclose on a borrower unless the borrower has been determined to be ineligible for the interest rate buy-down program, if one is operational in the state in which the institution or association is located.

2. For the period beginning on the date of enactment of this title and ending three years from the date of enactment, the Farm Credit System cannot foreclose on a borrower—

(a) unless the borrower has been determined to be ineligible for the interest rate buy-down program during the year in which the program is operational in the state; and

(b) unless the borrower has been determined to be ineligible for the principal/interest restructuring program described below.

3. Principal/Interest Restructuring Program:

(a) If the costs associated with foreclosure equal or exceed the cost of restructuring a loan in an amount which will enable the borrower to make payments, the Farm Credit System will be required to restructure the loan in lieu of foreclosing.

(b) Eligible borrowers are those who:

(1) are delinquent in payments of principal or interest during the period beginning on the date of enactment and ending 3 years after such date;

(2) demonstrate that the delinquency is beyond the control of the borrower;

(3) derived not less than 50 percent of their gross annual income for three of the past five years from agriculture; and

(4) had gross agricultural sales in excess of $30,000 for 3 of the past 5 years.

(c) Requires the Capital Corporation to reimburse an institution for the amount of principal due on loans that is reduced by the institution if the chairman determines that such action is necessary to avoid the liquidation or insolvency of the institution.

4. Encourages the Farm Credit System to allow borrowers who will be foreclosed on to retain possession and occupancy of any principal residence of the borrower and a reasonable amount of adjoining land.

5. Disposition of Acquired Property:

(a) Requires the F.C.A. to issue regulations identifying the proper handling of acquired farmland.

(b) Requires the F.C.S. to the extent practicable to sell or lease farmland in the following order of priority—

(1) sale to operators of not larger than family-size farms, and

(2) lease to operators of not larger than family-size farms.

(c) Prohibits the selling of farmland if it will have a detrimental effect on the value of farmland in the area.

(d) Special consideration in the sale or leasing of farmland must would be given to previous owners if such owner has financial resources, and farm management skills and experience sufficient to assure a reasonable prospect of success. Leasing would be based on a competitive bid basis.

6. Requires the Farm Credit System to provide a borrower with copies of the appraisals of the assets of the borrower.

7. Prohibits the Farm Credit System from requiring additional collateral on a loan if the borrower is current in the payment of principal or interest.

8. Prohibits the Farm Credit System from foreclosing on a borrower for failure to provide additional collateral if the borrower is current in the payment of principal or interest.

9. Before providing a new loan to a borrower or entering into an installment contract for the purchase of farmland acquired by the Farm Credit System, the borrower must purchase stock in the farm credit system.

10. Prohibits the Farm Credit System from raising the interest rate on a loan that has been classified.

11. Limits operating expenses of FCS institutions to 1 percent above the average cost of bonds issued by the System.

12. Requires the Farm Credit Administration, within 60 days from the date of enactment and every 90 days thereafter, to determine whether the Farm Credit System is in need of financial assistance.

TITLE III: FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION

1. Principal/Interest Restructuring Program:

(a) If the costs associated with foreclosure equal or exceed the cost of restructuring a loan in an amount which will enable the borrower to make payments, the FmHA will be required to restructure the loan in lieu of foreclosing; and

(b) Eligible borrowers are those who:

(1) are delinquent in payments of principal or interest during the period beginning on the date of enactment and ending 3 years after such date;

(2) demonstrate that the delinquency is beyond the control of the borrower;

(3) derived not less than 50 percent of their gross annual income for three of the past five years from agriculture; and

(4) had gross agricultural sales in excess of $30,000 for 3 of the past 5 years.

2. Prohibits the FmHA from requiring additional collateral on a loan if the borrower is current in the payment of principal or interest.

3. Prohibits the FmHA from foreclosing on a borrower for failure to provide additional collateral if borrower is current in the payment of principal or interest.

4. Authorizes the FmHA to make loans to farmers and ranchers for the purpose of producing alternative crops. Alternative crops are those not traditionally produced in the area.

TITLE IV. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

1. Establishes an InterAgency Agricultural Task Force to assist commercial agricultural banks and the borrowers of the banks to resolve present economic problems and to facilitate commercial bank lending to agriculture in the future.

2. Requires regulations to be issued within 90 days from the date of enactment.

3. (a) Authorizes appropriations as necessary; and

(b) Requires that no less than $30 million nor more than $35 million of the funds appropriated for the Interest Rate Reduction Program authorized by the 1985 farm bill be used to fund the Interest Rate Buy-Down program authorized by this Act in Fiscal Year 1986.

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BAUCUS, and Mr. MOYNIHAN):

S. 2333. A bill to amend title XIX of the Social Security Act to strengthen and improve medicaid services to low-income pregnant women and children; to the Committee on Finance.

MEDICAID MATERNAL AND INFANT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am proud to introduce the Medicaid Maternal and Infant Amendments of 1986 today along with my distinguished colleagues from both sides of the aisle. This bill would enable States to expand and target Medicaid prenatal, delivery, and postpartum services to mothers, and medical care to their infants up to age 1.

Health care in America must be judged not only on its ability to cure sickness, but also on its capacity to keep people well. Nowhere is this more important than in the health of mothers and children. Preventive services for them will not only alleviate many deaths and much suffering, but more than pay for itself by giving these babies a fighting chance to grow up healthy and become productive citizens.

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

In 1985, I sponsored S. 505, the Maternal and Child Health Preventive Care Amendments of 1985, with my colleague from Texas, Senator BENTSEN. It is gratifying to me that our colleagues in Congress agreed that by spending a few cents now so that States can target expanded Medicaid prenatal services, we can save lots of dollars down the road. And at the same time improve the lives of so many Americans. S. 505 was included in the fiscal year 1986 budget reconciliation package that was signed into law by the President last week.

Today's proposal is the next logical step after S. 505 in providing needed health services to pregnant women and their infants.

Also last fall, as chairman of the Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee of the Governmental Affairs Committee, I conducted a hearing on S. 1209, the National Commission on Infant Mortality which I cosponsored with the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, Senator CHILES. We held the hearing at Providence Hospital here in Washington to focus attention on an institution that has made a commitment to affordable maternity care for poor women. Through its Center for Life, Providence Hospital subsidizes maternity care for about 300 low-income pregnant women each year.

At the hearing, we heard from Sarah Brown of the Institute of Medicine who described IOM's landmark study on infant mortality. She and the others who testified added fuel to the hearing's fire. Infant mortality is a nationwide problem that needs Federal attention, now.

I should add that last week I also cosponsored comparable legislation, S. 2288, the Infant Mortality Prevention Act, along with my colleagues, Senators CHILES and BENTSEN. Today's bill goes further than S. 2288. While S. 2288 moves in the right direction, we are taking a bolder leap today.

I endorsed both measures because I will support any and all proposals that would move the Congress in the direction of preventing death or disability for this Nation's infants. As I have said so many times, the best incubator of all is the mother's womb, not the machinery of the neonatal intensive care unit. If we are going to make better lives for our children, we have to assure they have every chance when they enter this world, whether they are rich or poor.

Today's legislation is a logical next step to reduce infant mortality and morbidity in this country.

NEED FOR THIS LEGISLATION

While many States are probably going as far as they can on income security programs like AFDC, this proposal would enable States that choose to expand their Medicaid coverage, to target this high risk group who would otherwise not qualify for Medicaid. This is essential if Government-sponsored health programs are going to make a meaningful contribution to preserving the health of our Nation's children, rather than financing sick care once they become categorically indigent.

The Medicaid Maternal and Infant Amendments of 1986 also has roots in the work of the Southern Governors' Task Force on Infant Mortality, chaired by the Governor of South Carolina, Richard Riley. This able group offered a number of legislative recommendations designed to enable States to expand and target programs aimed at reducing infant deaths and disabilities. Its work has also been endorsed by the National Governors' Association.

This Nation has come a long way in improving the health of infants and children. Since the enactment of Medicaid in 1965, we have reduced the U.S. infant mortality rate by over 50 percent. This is impressive, but a little explanation of how we did this will show that more work needs to be done. The credit for these achievements' survival is due in large part to advances in technology—neonatal intensive care units, NICU's. And the reason why so many infants spend their first few weeks of life in NICU's? Because their birthweight was too low to allow them to survive on their own without the support of fancy and expensive technology—expensive to the tune of about $1,250 a day in a typical NICU in Minneapolis or St. Paul.

These low birthweight babies are 40 times more likely to die during their first month of life and five times more likely to die within their first year of life than plump, normal weight newborns. They are also at a much higher risk of disabilities such as cerebral palsy, mental retardation, and learning disabilities. And the tragedy is that many of these destinies are often preventable for these little babies.

Although we've done a very good job of keeping low birthweight babies alive in NICU's, we have a poor record as a nation in preventing low birthweights in the first place. As a matter of fact, between 1971 and 1981, we reduced the incidence of babies being born at low birthweights by less than 1 percent.

What all this means is that we must write out a check today as an investment in our future. There is little question that this approach not only improves maternal and child health, but it also saves our health care system a substantial amount of money. In the recent study by the Institute of Medicine, it was shown that every $1 spent on prenatal care saved $3.38 in the first year of a child's life.

The Medicaid Maternal and Infant Amendments of 1986 reflects an important national purpose—doing all we can to help moms save healthy babies. My colleagues on the Budget Committee, Senators DOMENICI, CHILES, and HOLLINGS, set aside $100 million in additional Medicaid spending for a new infant mortality initiative. Today's legislation offers us a wise and prudent way to allocate those funds.

Our bill is another step on the road to prevention and to cost-effective health care spending. I will soon be introducing another bill with Senator KENNEDY which will take us even further down that road. I urge my colleagues, when considering these proposals, not to be victimized by those who espouse short-sighted budgeteering. These proposals represent the responsible way to deliver valuable services while containing costs—through far-sighted, humane, and cost-effective health policy. It's not often that a bill is presented which provides health care services to those in need while at the same time saving society the emotional and financial costs of death and disability. This is just such a bill and I urge all my colleagues to support it.

EXPLANATION OF THE BILL

Under current law, States that want to provide essential health care under Medicaid to poor women and infants, generally cannot do so without also providing cash welfare. Our legislation would allow States, at their option, to offer Medicaid to poor pregnant women and their infants whose family income is above the Aid to Families With Dependent Children [AFDC] standards, but below 100 percent of the Federal poverty line. There are currently 3.4 million women of childbearing age living in households below the Federal poverty line who are not covered by Medicaid. These women have little of any access to prenatal services. It is time to make early prenatal care more widely available.

States could not reduce their AFDC levels in order to expand the Medicaid Program. The existing resources requirements of Medicaid law would still apply. States could set their income threshold at any point up to 100 percent of the Federal poverty level.

The establishment of this new optional categorically needy group would give States the flexibility to target their Medicaid coverage of poor pregnant women and infants who are now ineligible for AFDC due to income or family status without raising the AFDC eligibility levels.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill and the text of my statement from this morning's press conference be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2333

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Medicaid Maternal and Infant Amendments of 1986"

SEC. 2. MEDICAID ELIGIBILITY OF LOW-INCOME INFANTS AND PREGNANT WOMEN.

(a) IN GENERAL.—

(1) Section 1902(a)(10)(A) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1396(a)(10)(A) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new clause:

"(iii) at the option of the State, as provided in subsection (1), to—

"(I) any pregnant woman during the period consisting of her pregnancy and the 60-day period following the last day of the pregnancy, if such woman's resources, including the resources of her family, meet the resources test of eligibility for medical assistance under the State plan approved under this title applicable to a family with dependent children, and such woman's income, including the income of her family, (determined in accordance with subsection (m)) does not exceed the higher of the income test of eligibility for medical assistance under such plan applicable to a family with dependent children or 100 percent of the official poverty line for an individual or for a family of the same size, as appropriate, established and adjusted under section 673(2) of the Community Services Block Grant Act (42 U.S.C. 9902(2)); and

"(II) any individual who has not attained one year of age without limitation as to amount, duration, or scope, if such individual's resources, including the resources of his or her family, are such that the individual meets the resources test of eligibility for medical assistance under the state plan approved under this title applicable to a family with dependent children, and such individual's income, including the income of his or her family (determined in accordance with subsection (m)) does not exceed the higher of the income test of eligibility for medical assistance under such plan applicable to a family with dependent children or 100 percent of the official poverty line for an individual or for a family of the same size, as appropriate, established and adjusted under section 673(2) of the Community Services Block Grant Act (42 U.S.C. 9902(2)); and

"(II) any individual who has not attained one year of age without limitation as to amount, duration, or scope, if such individual's resources, including the higher of the income test of eligibility for medical assistance under such plan applicable to a family with dependent children or 100 percent of the official poverty line for an individual or for a family of the same size, as appropriate, established and adjusted under section 673(2) of the Community Services Block Grant Act (42 U.S.C. 9902(2)).".

(2) Section 1902 of such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(l) A State plan may not elect the option of furnishing medical assistance to individuals described in subsection (a)(10)(A)(iii) unless the State has in effect, under its State plan approved under part A of title IV, income and resource tests for eligibility that are no stricter than those in effect on the date of the enactment of this subsection and payment levels that are not less than the payment levels in effect under such plan on such date.

"(m) In applying the income standards established under subsection (a)(10)(A)(iii), each State shall take into consideration the same income and expense (including work-related expenses) and disregard the same items of income in the same manner as they would be taken into account or disregarded under the State's plan under part A of title IV.".

(b) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Section 1902(a)(17) of such Act is amended by inserting ", except as provided in paragraph (10)(A)(iii)," after "which" the first place it appears.

(2) Section 1903(f) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1396(f)) is amended—

(A) in paragraph (1) by striking out "paragraph (4)" and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraphs (4) and (5)"; and

(B) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(5) The limitations on payment imposed by paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of this subsection shall not apply with respect to any amount expended by a State as medical assistance for any individual eligible for such assistance by reason of section 1902(a)(10)(A)(iii).".

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The amendments made by section 2 of this Act shall apply to medical assistance, provided under a State plan approved under title XIX of the Social Security Act, for calendar quarters beginning more than six months after the date of the enactment of this Act.

REMARKS OF SENATOR DURENBERGER—MATERNAL AND CHILD HEALTH PRESS CONFERENCE, APRIL 17, 1986

Some of you may have been to John Heinz' press conference earlier this morning about preserving the quality of health care for Medicare recipients—an effort that Ted and I and many of our colleagues have been very involved in. And here we are looking at the other end of the spectrum—protecting the health of the unborn and the newborn.

Last week I joined my colleagues Lawton Chiles and Lloyd Bentsen in introducing S. 2288, the Infant Mortality Prevention Act or IMPACT. The bill we are introducing today goes a step further in protecting maternal and child health.

The late Hubert Humphrey once said the moral test of government is how it treats those in the dawn of life, the children; those in the twilight of life, the elderly; and those in the shadows of life—the sick, the needy and the handicapped.

Those words have, in a sense, taken on added meaning in these days of scarce federal resources. The uncontrolled increase in hospital and other acute care services sapped the financial strength of wellness-care and health promotion.

We have made great progress in the past several years in slowing the increase in the cost of health care. But the deficit crunch has led some people to believe there still isn't enough money to go around—that to do all we need to do, we need to "ration" our health care dollars, making decisions on who deserves care and how much. That's baloney.

The health care message for the 80s is not to ration health care, but to improve both the quality and the availability of health care by setting priorities. That is what we are doing today with this legislation. Because there is no greater priority than a newborn life.

This bill will help ensure a healthy entry into this world for millions of American children, by allowing states to offer prenatal, delivery and post-delivery medical care to all women and their infants living at or below the federal poverty level.

What do I mean by priority-setting in health care spending? I mean, for example, stopping our policy of subsidizing some people's unhealthy choices at the expense of those whose health problems are not of their own making. Hundreds of thousands of Americans are smoking themselves into coronaries and lung cancer. The total economic cost of smoking is $41 billion a year, including $4 billion to Medicare and Medicaid.

And yet, some people will tell you we don't have enough money to pay for effective, comprehensive medical care for low-income pregnant women, to give our children a strong fighting chance at a healthy life. That's what I call misplaced priorities.

We're not here this morning to talk about some research program or grand experiment. In large part, it's just plain old common sense in about 10 one-hour doses over a 9-month pregnancy. We know that prenatal care significantly increases the chances of producing a healthy child. For example, prenatal services can drastically reduce the frequency of low-birthweight babies, who are 40 times more likely than other infants to die within the first year, and who tend to suffer a wide range of long-term health problems.

We also know who we need to reach. Women who are poor . . . who are black or Native American . . . who have no health insurance . . . who live in inner-cities or rural areas . . . who live in the southern United States—These women are much more likely to give birth to unhealthy children, simply because they are denied access to proper health care or to the information telling them how to get it.

The Medicaid program can offer these women the help they need—especially now, under a recent change in the program, initiated in my Health Subcommittee, which allows more comprehensive prenatal care services under Medicaid. But as many as 3.4 million women of child-bearing age do not have access to Medicaid because they don't fit the qualifications for AFDC welfare—even though they are living below the poverty line. Our legislation allows states to offer their Medicaid coverage to those women, and it is our sincere hope that the states will do so.

The cost of the loss of newborn life is immeasurable. The cost of caring for infants with permanent disabilities is massive. The annual cost of neonatal intensive care alone exceeds $1.5 billion. And the price of special education and long-term care for the life of each child with chronic disabilities can easily reach $400,000. Compare that figure with the projected cost of the first phase of this program: $100 million. In sheer economic terms, it will pay for itself with the first 250 healthy children it produces.

Of course, we must guarantee all children adequate care after they're born. But it's just good sense to put our money up-front in preventive care to give our kids a healthy start from the moment of birth.

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, today we initiate an attack on one of the most challenging problems our Nation faces today: Infant mortality and low birthweight babies. The future of any nation depends on the well-being of its children. Yet, the rate of low birthweight deliveries is higher in the United States than in 12 other developed countries. The legislation we are introducing signals a partnership between the Federal Government and the States to get at the root of these life-threatening problems. Our bill, Mr. President, implements the solution that all studies and our own common sense tells us is the easiest, least costly, most appropriate response to reducing infant mortality and low birthweight; that is, providing adequate prenatal care for women and comprehensive care for the infant. The Federal Government has long supported prenatal care and counseled all women to secure such care early in pregnancy. We are, therefore, uniquely positioned to play an important role in the effort to ensure ready access to these vital services.

To assume this role, we must first remove some existing barriers. Under current legislation, States cannot provide essential health care services to poor women and infants without first raising the cash welfare level to include them. This is a barrier to provision of these services because many States cannot afford to provide both the health services needed and the additional welfare benefits. Also, Medicaid regulations, do not routinely permit States to target only these particular health services. Our bill makes an important change by amending the Medicaid statute to permit States to provide Medicaid coverage for pregnant women and infants whose incomes are above the State AFDC standard of need but within the Federal poverty level without requiring the prior incurrence of medical expenses. Our bill maintains the State's current AFDC match rate and resource requirements and contains a hold-harmless provision requiring States to maintain their current AFDC eligibility level to participate in this option. A minimum benefit period equal to the duration of pregnancy plus 60 days would be established in order to prevent loss of coverage in mid-pregnancy.

Mr. President, as a former Governor of South Carolina, I can say with some authority that no matter what your agenda is, when you take office, the fact of infant mortality and low birthweight demands your attention. When I was Governor, several of my friends insisted that I tour the State to see children with swollen bellies, with worms, with all forms of birth defects; people who were continually hungry; people who had no decent place to live and were literally drinking their own sewage. Since I had jobs and economic development as a priority and was working to convince industry that South Carolina was the ideal place for them to locate, it was not exactly the kind of public relations campaign I was seeking. But mothers and children who were malnourished and had virtually no access to health care of any kind were a fact of life in the State of which I was Governor, and I did see these people and their condition demanded action on my part. There is probably not a Member of this body who has not heard me quote the figures that each dollar spent to provide prenatal care and food supplements to pregnant women through WIC can save $3 by reducing the incidence of high-risk births. This is largely due to the fact that, working with my friend, Hubert Humphrey, WIC was the action I took in response to the hunger I saw as Governor of South Carolina.

It came as no surprise to me that, in 1984, the Southern Governors' Association established the Regional Task Force on Infant Mortality, or to learn that my own Governor, Richard W. Riley, was to be its chairman. The seven States with the highest infant mortality rates were in the South, and South Carolina was the worst. The task force not only did a superb job of bringing national attention to our problems in the South, but it also let the Nation know what we are doing about them and what remains to be done. In July 1985, the task force issued three reports which make realistic, pragmatic recommendations and outline action plans for comprehensive solutions to the problems of infant mortality and low birthweight. Among the recommendations for Federal action was amendment of the Medicaid law to permit States to provide assistance to poor families whose incomes are over the State's AFDC standard of need but below the Federal poverty level. This proposal was subsequently endorsed unanimously by the National Governors' Association in its February 1986 meeting.

Medicaid is the Nation's primary financing source for the health care of poor mothers and children, but current Medicaid criteria have produced obstacles to provision of preventive care in too many instances. It has been suggested by some that the Medically Needy Program could provide these services, but this important program is a catastrophic health program that is not oriented to providing preventive and primary care services. Eligibility for benefits is based on a spend-down feature which requires the incurrence of expenses prior to receiving assistance. The catastrophic design means the program pays for services such as hospitalization, when lower cost treatments, had they been accessible, could have prevented the need for more expensive care. It is in the long-term interest to provide preventive care to childbearing women and young children with incomes below the Federal poverty level—to prevent incidence of costly conditions that may last a lifetime.

Historically, Congress has not done as well as it might in funding preventive care. This has happened, I believe, because of the pressure we are under to be accountable for the expenditure of tax dollars; and, of course, this is proper. But what has evolved is a system of paying for illness instead of wellness. In our efforts to be accountable, it is much easier to prove that we have provided hospitalization for a specific number of patients with heart attacks over a given period, for example, than that expenditure of tax dollars prevented a certain number of heart attacks. We feel much more comfortable quoting the number of neonatal intensive care days paid for with Federal funds than saying how many low-weight births we prevented. Only recently have we paid serious attention to health promotion and disease prevention, and the data is now available which provides us sufficient statistical evidence in aggregate figures to support more preventive measures, such as reduction in infant mortality and low birthweight. The figures prove preventive services are cost-effective.

In 1982, the Institute of Medicine convened a planning group to explore how the Nation might best invest its resources to promote child health and development. The report of the resulting Committee to Study the Prevention of Low Birthweight was reviewed by the National Academy of Sciences, the National Academy of Engineering, and the Institute of Medicine. After extensive study, the report recommends expansion of prenatal services to the existing Medicaid population. The report states:

> Although the neonatal mortality rate in the United States has improved over the past 15 years, there has not been a comparable decrease in low-weight births. Instead, the mortality decline has been accomplished primarily by improving the survival of low birthweight infants through very costly neonatal intensive care. The association of neurodevelopmental handicaps and congenital anomalies with low birthweight has been well established; low birthweight infants also are susceptible to a wide range of other conditions, such as lower respiratory tract infections, learning disorders, behavior problems, and complications of neonatal intensive care interventions.

The Nation is currently spending about $700 million per year just on hospital care for high-risk infants; this does not include the cost of Medicaid of long-term institutionalization of children left permanently disabled by preventable causes or the cost of outpatient care resulting from the chronic problems to which low birthweight babies are prone. It is estimated that for the population currently eligible for Medicaid, each dollar spent to provide comprehensive maternity care could save nearly $2 by reducing prematurity and low birthweight.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a statistical information table from "Preventing Low Birthweight" at the end of my remarks.

The study referenced in this table includes only the population currently Medicaid eligible and reflects only savings from providing more comprehensive prenatal care. Reason dictates that if the savings projected here would be realized for a population that is already eligible for and receiving some prenatal services, even larger savings could be expected by providing services for the populations covered by this bill.

Cost comparisons developed by the Southern Regional Task Force on Infant Mortality state the cost of prenatal care, hospital costs for mother and baby, rehospitalization, pediatric health care, and rehabilitative costs for a normal baby are about $2,000 per year. The same costs for a low birthweight baby of 4 pounds is about $54,800 per year. For a low birthweight baby requiring institutionalization, the costs can go as high as $389,800 per child.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include a table in the RECORD, at the conclusion of my remarks that shows these costs.

Mr. President, we have been losing the battle in the last few years. According to data submitted by the Children's Defense Fund in support of additional funding in the fiscal year 1987 budget, key material and child health indicators are eroding.

Between 1982 and 1983, postneonatal mortality—deaths of infants ages 28 days to 1 year—rose 3 percent nationwide and 5 percent nationwide for black infants. The mortality increase among black babies was the first such recorded increase in 18 years.

In 1983, the percentage of women receiving late or no prenatal care rose for the third consecutive year. The percentage of premature and low-birthweight births also rose in 1983.

Over half of all black preschool children are inadequately immunized against childhood diseases. Between 1983 and 1984, there was a 69-percent increase in measles cases nationwide.

One-third of poor children with family incomes below the Federal poverty level are either completely uninsured or are insured for only a portion of the year. One-third of all poor women of childbearing age are uninsured. Medicaid reached only 46 percent of the poor and near-poor population in 1985, down from 65 percent in 1969. Title V Maternal and Child Health Clinics serve only a fraction of all uninsured mothers and children; clinics throughout the country report enormous waiting lists. In 1985, WIC reached fewer than half the women, infants, and children eligible; 10 States served 30 percent or fewer of their WIC-eligible populations.

Mr. President, the problem we face is well-defined. We know what to do. Study after study has shown that more than any other factor, adequate prenatal and post partum care reduces infant mortality and low birthweight. It is time to act, and the bill we introduce today is a very significant step in the right direction. I urge my colleagues to join with us in cosponsoring this important bill and working for its quick passage.

There being no objection, the material mentioned earlier was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The birth of infants weighing less than 2,500 grams, and particularly those of 1,500 grams or less, imposes a large economic burden on our nation by contributing substantially to neonatal mortality, to disability among surviving infants, and to the cost of health care.

The provision of adequate prenatal services, as currently practiced, to all pregnant women who receive public assistance and who have attained less than a high school education would require increased expenditures, but would decrease the overall fiscal outlays of governmental agencies for the care of the low birthweight infants born to these high-risk women. Savings in the cost of care of low birthweight children would probably more than offset the additional cost for the prenatal services. Similarly, further net savings in overall fiscal outlays for the care of low birthweight children would be likely to result from the provision of appropriate prenatal services to other groups of women who are at high risk of delivering low birthweight infants.

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this year, 287,000 babies will be born with low birthweight causing two-thirds of all infant mortality. A low-birthweight infant is 40 times more likely to die in the first month of life, 5 times more likely in the first year. Over the last decade, there have been solid gains in reducing the number of low-birthweight births. While there are many causes of low birthweight, there is one simple and effective solution: medical care during pregnancy.

Today, I am introducing with my colleagues in both the Senate and the House of Representatives a bill to make medical care more available to women and children. This measure will allow States to extend the Medicaid program to pregnant women and their infants who have poverty-level incomes but who are above the AFDC level for their State. This measure was recommended by the Southern Governors' Task Force on Infant Mortality and unanimously endorsed by the National Governors' Association.

There are 3.4 million women of child-bearing age who may benefit from this step. Medicaid coverage will give them access to prenatal care which has been shown to bring down the rate of low birthweight by one-half to two-thirds. If we can reduce this rate by even 1 percent, we can save $42.5 million.

Countless families will be saved the anxiety of having a hospitalized infant. Thousands of babies will be saved from a lifetime of disability. And many infant lives will be saved. In addition, this measure may allow women who are trying to get off welfare to do so without sacrificing access to health care for themselves when they are pregnant or for their infants.

I believe the step we are taking today is a rational one. Universal access to health care for pregnant women and children should be our goal. This expansion of the Medicaid Program will take us one step closer to it.●

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, S. 2333 is an important bill, a bill that will take us a long way toward improving access to health services for women and infants at risk. For several years, I and a number of my colleagues have worked to improve targeting of Medicaid services for this population.

I am pleased today to be a part of yet another step in our effort to extend needed care to a vulnerable and often overlooked population. Governor Riley of South Carolina and the Southern Governors Task Force on Infant Mortality are to be congratulated both for developing a set of policy goals and for the educational campaign which they undertook in an effort to improve public understanding of the need for these changes.

It is now general knowledge that significant savings—financial as well as social—are associated with early intervention through good prenatal programs and preventive care for infants. As most of my colleagues are already aware, numerous studies have shown that an expenditure of $1 in prenatal services can yield as much as $12 in savings through reduced costs of intensive neonatal care and the long-term institutional expenditures that often accompany the handicaps associated with premature birth and low birthweight.

As Governor Riley's task force has shown, 10 of the 11 States with the most severe infant mortality rates are in the Southern region of the United States. In the South, it is estimated that 1 of every 15 mothers is likely to have a child with a discernible mental or physical handicap. While the national average is 6.8 percent, 7.6 percent of all babies born in the Southern States are low in birthweight—which is, of course, closely correlated with high rates of infant mortality, and the incidence of lifelong handicapping conditions.

Technically, S. 2333 assumes that States will be offered the option of extending coverage to those women and infants whose incomes exceed the current eligibility threshold for Medicaid, but who, nevertheless, are below 100 percent of the poverty level. While I am hopeful that we will be able to provide services to this entire population on enactment, it may be necessary to adjust eligibility to comply with final Congressional Budget Office cost estimates. However, if such a change is needed, I hope that members of the Finance Committee will join me in support of implementing this change as quickly as costs allow.

In sum, Mr. President, passage of S. 2333 will permit States to improve access to health care by restructuring eligibility and benefits under the Medicaid Program according to local priorities. I invite my colleagues to join with us in support of that goal.●

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today my colleagues and I are introducing legislation which represents a major initiative toward reducing the high infant mortality rate of this Nation.

The United States has a higher infant mortality rate than many other developed countries such as Sweden, Japan, Denmark, Norway, France, Spain, Canada, East Germany, and the United Kingdom. Recent statistics indicate that for every 1,000 live births, approximately 11 babies will die before the age of 1 year. In my home State of South Carolina the problem is greater, with 15 deaths for every 1,000 live births.

Mr. President, two-thirds of infant deaths occur in the neonatal period—the first month of life. The factor most commonly associated with these newborn deaths is low birthweight. The smaller the baby, the poorer the chances of healthy survival. A low-birthweight baby is more likely to need costly special care. In addition, low-birthweight babies also have significantly higher rates of rehospitalization. To address the problem of low-birthweight infants, the Medicaid system needs to be improved. This legislation is designed to accomplish that goal.

Mr. President, Medicaid plays a critical role as the Nation's principal financing source for the health care of mothers and children who are financially unable to help themselves. However, as many as 3.4 million poor pregnant women a year are denied vital prenatal care because they are ineligible for Medicaid. Without proper prenatal care, many unnecessary low-birthweight babies are born who need significant ongoing medical attention. This, of course, means additional medical expenses. In many cases, the high medical expenses associated with low-birthweight babies drain the financial resources of the mother until she then becomes eligible for Medicaid. Medicaid then must pick up the tab for the expensive institutional medical treatment.

Mr. President, what is needed, and what this legislation provides, is an approach geared toward preventative medicine. Under this legislation, the Medicaid law would be amended to allow States, with an Aid to Families With Dependent Children [AFDC] standard of need above 50 percent of the Federal poverty level, to target Medicaid assistance to pregnant women and infants, without the State also being required to raise AFDC payments to this group. This action would be completely optional with the States. The idea behind this change is to remove a financial obstacle for many States that want to provide a compenhensive maternity and infant health-care package to indigent women, but have not done so because of the high cost of State matching requirements for AFDC payments.

Mr. President, the cost of this bill will be $100 million to the Federal Government. This amount has already been added to the Domenici-Chiles budget plan to cover the cost of the expansion, after the Budget Committee gave it careful consideration.

Mr. President, I want to emphasize that these moneys spent now will prove cost-effective over the long run. The American Academy of Pediatrics reported in 1984 that for every dollar spent on prenatal care, $2 to $10 can be saved down the road. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." This is the approach of this legislation, and I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

By Mr. THURMOND:

S. 2334. A bill to amend section 207 of title 18, United States Code, to prohibit Members of Congress and officers and employees of any branch of the U.S. Government from attempting to influence the U.S. Government or from representing or advising a foreign entity for a proscribed period after such officer or employee leaves Government service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTEGRITY IN POSTEMPLOYMENT ACT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I am introducing tough, new legislation that will restrict all Federal employees from lobbying the Federal Government for 1 year, and from working for a foreign entity for 2 years, after they leave Government service.

This legislation also mandates a complete prohibition on certain high-level Federal officials from ever representing, assisting, advising, or lobbying in behalf of a foreign government or entity.

Mr. President, the potency of this legislation is that it applies to all Federal employees, regardless of rank, grade, or status, and that it mandates criminal penalties for violations—including fines of up to $250,000 and prison terms of up to 2 years.

It is a proposal whose time has come, and one which seeks to maintain public confidence and integrity in Federal Government service. In its simplest form, it provides a uniform, straightforward, and enforceable way to prevent those who are employed by the Federal Government from leaving public service and marketing their access and influence for private gain. It will also terminate violations of public trust by halting very high-ranking Federal officials, who by the nature of their jobs are privy to some of our Government's most sensitive information about national security and trade, from vending that information to a foreign entity.

There is something very disquieting to me, and I suspect the great majority of Americans, about high-level officials leaving the service of the Federal Government and going to work assisting, advising, lobbying, or in any way representing a foreign power for compensation. The absolute prohibition against this practice would help end the problem of foreign entities gaining knowledge and information, in any way, about such things as our Nation's international trade strategy or defense posture from former officials whose knowledge of those issues could do harm to this country if it is conveyed to others.

The officials affected by a lifelong prohibition would include, among others: Cabinet Secretaries; Director of Central Intelligence Agency; Secretaries of the armed services; U.S. Trade Representative; Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation; and high-ranking White House officials.

Mr. President, this legislation is a starting place for the Congress to consider much-needed changes to the confusing and oftentimes conflicting laws and regulations now governing former Federal officials who lobby the Federal Government or work for a foreign entity. It is an attempt to restore rationality and effectiveness to the ethics provisions applying to the Federal Government. Toward that end, my bill would apply equally to all branches of the Federal Government and to all Federal employees—including Members of Congress, Government-established corporations, and the military.

The Judiciary Committee has tentatively set a hearing on this bill and other lobbying-related issues on April 29. I look forward to hearing testimony on this issue and to working with my colleagues on this important legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2334

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Integrity in Post Employment Act of 1986".

SEC. 2. DISQUALIFICATION OF FORMER MEMBERS, OFFICERS, AND EMPLOYEES FROM ATTEMPTING TO INFLUENCE THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT OR REPRESENTING OR ADVISING A FOREIGN ENTITY.

(a) PROHIBITION.—(1) Section 207 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out subsections (b) through (e) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(b) Whoever, having been a Member of Congress, an officer or employee of the United States, including a special Government employee who has served in excess of sixty days during any period of three hundred and sixty-five consecutive days, in the executive, legislative, or judicial branch of the Government, or in any independent agency of the United States, or an officer or employee of a Government corporation, Government controlled corporation, or an independent establishment as defined in section 104 of title 5—

"(1) Within one year after termination of employment with the intent to influence makes any oral or written communication to any Member of Congress, officer or employee of the United States, including a special Government employee, in the executive, legislative, or judicial branch of the Government, or in any independent agency of the United States on behalf of another person (other than the United States) for compensation, financial gain, or other remuneration; or

"(2) within two years after termination of employment—

"(A) is employed by, or advises, represents, or assists any foreign entity for compensation, financial gain, or other remuneration; or

"(B) with intent to influence makes any oral or written communication to any Member of Congress, officer or employee of the United States, including a special Government employee, in the executive, legislative, or judicial branch of the Government, or in any independent agency of the United States on behalf of any foreign entity for compensation, financial gain, or other remuneration, shall be fined not more than $250,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

"(c) Whoever, having been employed in a position listed in section 5312 or 5313 of title 5 or under section 105(a)(2)(A) of title 3, at any time after termination of employment—

"(1) is employed by, or advises, represents, or assists in any way, directly or indirectly, a foreign entity; or

"(2) with intent to influence makes any oral or written communication to any Member of Congress, officer, or employee of the United States, including a special Government employee, in the executive, legislative, or judicial branch of the Government, or in any independent agency of the United States on behalf of any foreign entity, shall be fined not more than $250,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

"(d)(1) The prohibitions of subsections (a) through (c) shall not apply to a former Member, officer, or employee who is acting in his official capacity as an elected official of a Federal, State, or local government.

"(2) The prohibition of subsection (b)(1) shall not apply to an attorney appearing in a judicial proceeding before a court of the United States.".

(2) Section 207 of title 18, United States Code, is further amended—

(A) by striking out subsections (h) and (i);

(B) in subsection (f) by designating such subsection as subsection (e) and striking out "subsections (a), (b), and (c)" and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (a)";

(C) by redesignating subsection (g) as subsection (f);

(D) in subsection (j) by redesignating such subsection as subsection (g) and striking out "subsection (a), (b), or (c)" in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (a)"; and

(E) by inserting at the end thereof the following:

"(h) For purposes of this section the term 'foreign entity' means—

"(1) a foreign country;

"(2) a foreign political party;

"(3) a person outside of the United States, unless it is established that such person is an individual and a citizen of the United States, or that such person is not an individual and is organized under or created by the laws of the United States or of any State or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States and has its principal place of business within the United States; or

"(4) a partnership, association, corporation, organization, or other combination of persons organized under the laws of or having its principal place of business in a foreign country.".

(3) Subsection (a) of section 207 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out "; or" at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "shall be fined not more than $250,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.".

(b) AMENDMENT TO CAPTION.—(1) Section 207 of title 18, United States Code, is further amended by striking out the caption for such section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"§ 207. Disqualification of former Members and employees and officers of any branch of Government from attempting to influence the United States Government or representing or advising a foreign entity".

(2) The table of sections for chapter 11 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out the item relating to section 207 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"207. Disqualification of former Members and employees and officers of any branch of Government from attempting to influence the United States Government or representing or advising a foreign entity.".

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by section 2 of this Act shall be effective upon the date of enactment of this Act.

By Mr. ABDNOR (for himself, Mr. BURDICK, and Mr. PRESSLER):

S. 2336. A bill to protect United States cattlemen from imports of live Canadian cattle, and to require the International Trade Commission to conduct a section 201 investigation of such imports; to the Committee on Finance.

MORATORIUM ON BEEF IMPORTS FROM CANADA

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, cattlemen in my home State of South Dakota and all across the United States have been suffering from years of economic stress. High interest rates, natural disasters, and imports of live cattle have left cattlemen without a profit and many are on the verge of bankruptcy.

Let me remind my colleagues that the American cowboy is a noble man who generally believes that little or no Government involvement in his industry is good. Ranchers do not derive any benefits from Federal farm programs and they don't want any. They haven't asked for handouts; instead, they are just asking for a fair shake.

Unfortunately, cattlemen haven't been getting a fair shake. Imports of live cattle have been streaming across our borders. Some of this beef is subsidized and unfairly undercuts in price the healthy, wholesome beef produced by American cattlemen. And while all beef entering the American market possibly isn't subsidized, this beef enjoys a de facto subsidy due to the high value of the U.S. dollar which allows foreign beef to be priced 20 to 30 percent below U.S. beef.

Of major concern to America's cattle industry is beef being imported from Canada. Canadian cattle have been pouring across our northern border. In my home State of South Dakota, semitruck loads of live cattle arrive every day. The reason for this glut of Canadian cattle on United States markets is threefold. First, it is the result of an over-valued U.S. dollar. Canadian beef producers enjoy an effective 20 percent or more subsidy in today's market. Second, imports of Canadian cattle are the result of provincial and national beef stabilization programs which give Canadian producers an unfair competitive advantage. Canada's National Beef Stabilization Program as well as provincial programs injure United States producers since our cattlemen do not benefit from such programs. Third, the herds of Canadian cattle on United States markets are the result of Canada's import policies which result in backdoor brokering. Backdoor brokering results when domestic beef in Canada is displaced by imports and when that domestically produced Canadian beef spills into the United States to make way for the imports. In essence, the United States beef market serves as a safety valve for anything Canada cannot consume.

At the present time Canada is importing subsidized beef from the European Community [EC]. Subsidized beef imports from the European Economic Community to Canada may be displacing domestically-produced Canadian beef to such an extent that Canadian cattle are being imported into the United States in increased quantities. This subsection or backdoor brokering needs immediate attention.

In 1983, Canada imported around 13 to 14 million pounds of beef products from the EC. In 1984, this rose to almost 50 million pounds.

Today I am introducing legislation to stop backdoor brokering from Canada. The legislation places a moratorium on the importation of live Canadian cattle.

The moratorium would remain in place while the International Trade Commission [ITC] undertakes and completes within 6 months a study under section 201 of the Trade Act of 1974 to determine if live cattle from Canada are being imported in such increased quantities as to be a substantial cause of serious injury to the beef industry in those States which serve as the major market areas for Canadian cattle. These States include Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Minnesota.

Upon completion of the study, the moratorium would be lifted if the ITC did not find serious injury to the livestock industry. If, however, serious injury was found, the moratorium would remain in effect. The ITC would periodically update the study, not less than twice each year. If, as a result of any study update, the ITC found that the injury is no longer serious, the moratorium would be lifted.

Unless Congress takes action to stop backdoor brokering from Canada and protect United States cattlemen from unfair imports, the demise of the cattle industry and small ranchers and feeders will continue. Cattlemen aren't looking for a handout. They are only asking for a fair shake.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 129—EXPRESSING OPPOSITION TO EUROPEAN ECONOMIC COMMUNITY RESTRICTIONS ADVERSELY AFFECTING UNITED STATES AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS

Mr. DOLE (for Mr. HELMS, for himself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. WILSON, Mr. BOREN, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. EXON, Mr. GORE, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. DIXON, and Mr. ANDREWS) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. CON. RES. 129

Whereas, as part of the terms under which Spain and Portugal joined the European Community in January of this year, the European Community has imposed quotas on oilseeds and oilseed products in Portugal, in violation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT);

Whereas the European Community has imposed a quota requiring that Portugal purchase at least 15.5 percent of its grain from other European Community countries, in violation of the GATT;

Whereas the European Community has replaced GATT-bound 20 percent tariffs on corn and grain sorghum imports entering Spain with the European Community's variable levy system, which is currently equivalent to a tariff of more than 100 percent, before negotiating compensation as agreed to previously and directed by international trade rules;

Whereas the restrictions imposed by the European Community will impair access for as much as $1 billion worth of United States agricultural products to markets in Portugal and Spain and adversely affect the economic livelihood of United States farmers and related industries;

Whereas, despite Cabinet-level approaches to the European Community in recent months, the European Community has been unwilling to rescind the illegal quotas or to compensate the United States for the damage caused by the higher tariffs;

Whereas prior enlargements of the European Community in 1973 and 1981 have adversely affected United States agricultural exports to the Community;

Whereas the President on March 31 announced his intention to use existing authority to respond to the restrictions of the European Community by imposing quotas and tariff increases or by withdrawing tariff bindings to produce equivalent restrictive effects or comparable loss of trade on European Community imports into the United States; and

Whereas the President's proposed actions to defend legitimate United States trade interests are consistent with his belief in a free but fair trade policy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that—

(1) the Administration should continue to firmly oppose actions by the European Community to (A) impose quotas on oilseeds and oilseed products in Portugal, (B) impose a grain purchase requirement quota on Portugal, and (C) place variable levies on corn and grain sorghum entering Spain before negotiating compensation; and

(2) Unless the European Community rescinds the trade-restrictive measures referred to in clause (1) or the United States receives prompt and complete compensation for any loss of trade resulting from the enlargement of the European Community, the Administration should take actions, such as the President has announced, to impose trade restrictions on a sufficient value of exports of the European Community to the United States to reestablish the balance of concessions under the GATT and other international trade agreements.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit copies of this resolution to the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of the Treasury, the United States Trade Representative, the Head of the Delegation of the European Community to the United States, and the Ambassadors to the United States for each of the member states of the European Community.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 130—RECOGNIZING A VISIT BY DESCENDANTS OF CERTAIN SETTLERS OF SOUTH CAROLINA TO SWITZERLAND AS AN INTERNATIONAL GESTURE OF GOODWILL

Mr. HOLLINGS submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. CON. RES. 130

Whereas in 1732 Jean Pierre Purry, under the auspices of the British authorities, founded the town of Purrysburg in the lower south eastern portion of South Carolina, on the Savannah River;

Whereas Colonel Purry, a native of Neufchatel, Switzerland, had promoted the colonization of Carolina and gathered a group of settlers from among the industrious and diligent Swiss;

Whereas the town of Purrysburg, South Carolina, was originally chartered as Swiss Quarter and prospered during its early years, boasting strong commercial, civil, religious, and military activities;

Whereas during the Revolutionary War, Purrysburg served as a headquarters for General Benjamin Lincoln;

Whereas President George Washington shared the Huguenot descent of the Purrysburg settlers and visited the town during a tour of the Southern States;

Whereas Purrysburg was abandoned after the Revolutionary War as the result of the growth of coastal cities such as Charleston; and

Whereas the descendents of the original settlers of Purrysburg, South Carolina, are visiting Neufchatel, Switzerland in October of 1986: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress recognizes the visit by the descendants of the original settlers of Purrysburg, South Carolina, to Neufchatel, Switzerland in October of 1986 as an international gesture of goodwill.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 131—RELATING TO THE RELEASE AND SAFE PASSAGE OF NAUM MEIMAN AND INNA KITROSSKAYA-MEIMAN

Mr. HART (for himself, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. MOYNIHAN, and Mr. MATHIAS) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 131

Whereas the Helsinki Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe commits the signatory countries to respect human rights and fundamental freedoms;

Whereas the signatory countries have pledged themselves to "fulfill in good faith their obligations under international law";

Whereas the signatory countries to the Final Act have declared their responsibility to "deal in a positive and humanitarian spirit with applications of persons who wish to be reunited with members of their family, with special attention being given to requests of an urgent character such as requests submitted by persons who are ill and old";

Whereas the Concluding Document of the Madrid meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe provides for the signatories to "favorably deal with" and "decide upon" applications for family reunification and to decide on such applications "within six months";

Whereas the Universal Declaration of Human Rights guarantees to all the rights of freedom of thought, conscience, religion, opinion, and expression;

Whereas the Declaration also affirms that "the family is the natural and fundamental group unit in society";

Whereas the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights guarantees that "everyone shall be free to leave any country, including his own";

Whereas the Soviet Union signed the Helsinki Final Act and the Concluding Document of the Madrid Conference, is obligated to respect the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and has ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights;

Whereas Naum Meiman and Inna Kitrosskaya-Meiman have applied for emigration visas for reasons of conscience and family reunification;

Whereas Dr. Meiman's application for emigration has been pending since 1974 and Mrs. Kitrosskaya-Meiman's application has been pending since 1979;

Whereas Dr. Meiman and Mrs Kitrosskaya-Meiman seek to join their daughter, Mrs. Olga Plam, who currently resides in Boulder, Colorado;

Whereas both Dr. Meiman and his wife have been subjected to continual harassment and are in urgent need of medical treatment unavailable in the Soviet Union;

Whereas the departure of Dr. Meiman with his background in advanced science and mathematics would pose no threat to Soviet national security, a fact confirmed by the signed statement of I.V. Chuvilo, director of the Soviet Institute of Theoretical and Experimental Physics, who stated that none of Dr. Meiman's work has been classified; and

Whereas the Soviet Union has shown little willingness to abide by its international obligations to expedite emigration cases which would promote family reunification and the resolution of the urgent medical cases of Dr. Meiman and his wife: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that in view of the Helsinki Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Concluding Document of the Madrid meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the Soviet Union—

(1) should immediately approve the exit visa applications of Dr. Naum Meiman and his wife, Mrs. Inna Kitrosskaya-Meiman; and

(2) should, upon approval of their visas, arrange for Dr. Meiman and his wife the appropriate means to facilitate their trip to the country of their choice.

SEC. 2. The Congress urges the President—

(1) to protest the Soviet Government's refusal to consider expeditiously the exit visa applications of Dr. Meiman and his wife;

(2) to call upon all other signatory nations of the Helsinki Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to join in such protests; and

(3) to instruct the United States delegation to the meeting of experts on human contacts organized under the auspices of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe in Bern, Switzerland to pursue vigorously the case of Dr. Meiman and his wife.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the President with the request that he further transmit a copy of such resolution to the Soviet Ambassador to the United States and to the Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, once again, on behalf of our good friends Naum and Inna Meiman, my colleagues and I are calling on the Soviet Union to adhere to the principles set forth in the conventions on human and political rights to which that nation is a signatory. Today, however, time has become a crucial factor.

Dr. Naum Meiman and his wife, Inna, have been trying for years to emigrate from the Soviet Union and join their daughter, Olga Plam, who is a constituent of mine in Colorado. Inna Meiman is now critically ill from cancer. But it has become clear that new technology exists in the West which would offer Inna Meiman some hope in curing her cancer. Dr. Douglas Zipes, of the University of Indiana, has offered to treat Inna Meiman and to cover the costs of her travel and medical care.

Yet Inna Meiman is still denied an exist visa. It is beyond my understanding what the Soviet authorities have to gain by continuing to deny exit visas to the Meimans. Last year, I raised the Meimans' case directly with then-Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko and other Soviet officials when I visited Moscow. My colleagues and I have pursued the case with Ambassador Dobrynin and have written to General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev asking for his help and intervention.

I am pleased to join colleagues from around the country in offering a concurrent resolution to express the sense of the Congress that the Soviet authorities provide for the release and safe passage of Naum and Inna Meiman. I hope that our colleagues will join with us in using this and every other available opportunity and channel of communication to raise the Meimans' case with Soviet officials and diplomats before it is too late.

Mr. President, when I was in the Soviet Union last year, I visited the war memorials and cemeteries which stand as grim reminders of the price paid by the Soviet Union in World War II. I visited the museums and institutions which are the sources of so many of the cultural gifts the Russian people have given the world. Yet the single most emotional and moving experience of my visit was the evening I spent with Naum and Inna Meiman—living examples of the triumph of the human spirit. I will never forget the evening I spent with the Meimans, and I hope they will never forget that they are not alone. The Meimans and other Soviet Jews who wish to emigrate have friends and supporters around the world.

Forty years after the holocaust, 40 years after Leningrad, the world is both a vastly different place and a not-so-different place. A generation which knew the horrors of World War II has been succeeded by a generation which must never know the horrors of nuclear war. Acting in good faith, representatives of the United States and the Soviet Union can take tangible steps to lessen the threat of nuclear war. Permission to let Naum and Inna Meiman—brave people who are threats to no one—leave the Soviet Union would be a small but tangible demonstration of Soviet good faith.

Last week, I joined several of my Senate colleagues in calling on the Reagan administration to consider steps to restrict nuclear testing and to demonstrate leadership in accepting the challenge of negotiations devoted to completing a nuclear test ban. Today, I call on the General Secretary of the Soviet Union to demonstrate leadership and accept a challenge of humanitarianism and hope. I join Dr. Zipes in sending this message: Inna Meiman is dying of cancer. Please expedite visas for Naum and Inna Meiman before it is too late. The world watches and awaits your humane response.●

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 132—ESTABLISHING A TEMPORARY JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET

Mr. COCHRAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. CON. RES. 132

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring),

SECTION. 1. TEMPORARY JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT.—There is established a Temporary Joint Committee on the Budget (hereafter in this concurrent resolution referred to as the "Joint Committee").

(b) COMPOSITION.—

(1) The Joint Committee shall be composed of the entire membership of the Committee on the Budget of the House of Representatives and the Committee on the Budget of the Senate.

(2) The chairman of the Committee on the Budget of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Committee on the Budget of the Senate shall serve as cochairmen of the Joint Committee.

(3) A majority vote of the members of the Joint Committee from each House shall be necessary for the Joint Committee to act.

(4) Vacancies in the membership of the Joint Committee shall not affect the power of the ramaining members to execute the functions of the Joint Committee and shall be filled in the same manner as in the case of the original selection.

(5)(A) There is established within the Joint Committee an executive committee, to be composed of—

(i) 6 members of the Committee on the Budget of the House of Representatives designated by the chairman of such committee;

(ii) 5 members of the Committee on the Budget of the House of Representatives designated by the ranking minority member of such Committee;

(iii) 5 members of the Committee on the Budget of the Senate designated by the chairman of such Committee; and

(iv) 4 members of the Committee on the Budget of the Senate designated by the ranking minority member of such Committee.

(B) A majority of the members of the Executive Committee from each House shall be necessary for the executive committee to act.

(c) DUTIES.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, or any provision of the Standing Rules of the Senate or the rules of the House of Representatives, the Joint Committee shall have the duty to report concurrent resolutions on the budget required to be reported under title III of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974. It shall do so only after considering the recommendations of the executive committee.

(d) CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS REPORTED BY THE JOINT COMMITTEE.—Any concurrent resolution reported by the Joint Committee shall be reported to each House of the Congress at the same time, in the same form, and with the same contents.

(e) DUTIES OF THE EXISTING BUDGET COMMITTEES.—Except as provided in subsection (c), the Committees on the Budget of the House of Representatives and the Senate shall have the duties assigned to them by the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974, by part C of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, and by the Standing Rules of the Senate and the Rules of the House of Representatives.

(f) HEARINGS AND TESTIMONY.—The Joint Committee and any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act at such times and places within the United States (whether the Congress is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned) to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, documents, or vouchers by subpoena or otherwise, and to take such testimony, as it deems advisable. A subpoena may be issued over the signatures of either of the co-chairmen of the Joint Committee, or a designee of either, and may be served by any person designated by the person signing it. An oath may be administered by either the co-chairmen of the Joint Committee, or a designee of either.

(g) STAFFING.—The staffs of the Committees on the Budget of the House of Representatives and the Senate shall serve as the staff of the Joint Committee.

(h) RECORDS.—The Joint Committee shall keep a complete record of all committee actions, including a record of the votes on any question on which a record vote is demanded.

(i) TREATMENT OF MEMBERSHIP UNDER SENATE RULES.—For purposes of paragraph 4 of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, service of a Senator as a member of the Joint Committee, or as a co-chairman of the Joint Committee, shall not be taken into account.

(j) The Joint Committee shall cease to exist at the close of the second session of the 99th Congress.

(k) EXERCISE OF RULEMAKING POWER.—The provisions of this section are enacted—

(1) as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the Senate and the House of Representatives, respectively, and as such they shall be considered as part of the rules of each House, respectively, or of that House to which they specifically apply, and such rules shall supersede other rules only to the extent that they are inconsistent therewith; and

(2) with full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules (so far as relating to such House) at any time, in the same manner and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of such House.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which I feel will assist the Congress in dealing with the budget mandates we face in a more expeditious and effective manner.

This is a concurrent resolution calling for the temporary establishment of a Joint Budget Committee. Congressman BOB MICHEL, the Republican leader in the House of Representatives has introduced identical legislation today in the House.

As we all know, congressional budget deadlines have been difficult to meet in the past, and may be even more difficult this year under the new Gramm-Rudman-Hollings timetables. We have already missed the April 15 deadline for completing action on a concurrent budget resolution for fiscal year 1987. Clearly, without joint congressional action, it may be impossible to meet other deadlines this year.

The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law provides that, in the event that the reporting procedures now before the Supreme Court are invalidated, there will be established a "Joint Committee on Deficit Reduction," made up of the entire membership of the Budget Committees of the House of Representatives and the Senate. The purpose of this joint committee is to report and pass a joint resolution requiring the President's signature in order to implement any sequestration.

We believe that Congress should not wait until the Supreme Court rules in this case to establish such a Joint Budget Committee. The immediate establishment of a Joint Committee, and commencement of deliberations on a budget resolution for fiscal year 1987, would ensure the best and most efficient implementation of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and the congressional budget process.

The temporary joint committee we are proposing would have the duty of reporting a concurrent budget resolution for fiscal year 1987. It would be composed of the entire membership of the Budget Committees of both Houses. The existing Budget Committee Chairmen would serve as cochairmen of the new Joint Committee.

An executive committee made up of one-third of the membership of each Budget Committee would be established to facilitate the proceedings of the much larger joint committee. The executive committee would make recommendations to the full joint committee for its approval or modification.

Establishment of a Joint Budget Committee on a temporary basis would also provide a trial period for determining the feasibility of a permanent Joint Budget Committee, as well as other needed reforms of our budget process.

I hope my colleagues will be able to support this legislation, which I'm convinced, would allow a reasonable and more efficient alternative for achieving our budget goals.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

FEDERAL FIRE PREVENTION AND CONTROL ACT AUTHORIZATION

GORTON AMENDMENT NO. 1793

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. GORTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill S. 2180) to authorize appropriations for activities under the Federal Fire Prevention and Control Act of 1974; as follows:

At the end of the bill, add the following:

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds—

(1) that various studies of governmental and non-governmental agencies indicate that daylight saving time over an expanded period would produce a significant energy savings in electrical power consumption;

(2) that daylight saving time may yield energy savings in other areas besides electrical power consumption;

(3) that daylight saving time over an expanded period could serve as an incentive for further energy conservation by individuals, companies, and the various governmental entities at all levels of government, and that such energy conservation efforts could lead to greatly expanded energy savings; and

(4) that the use of daylight saving time over an expanded period could have other beneficial effects on the public interest, including the reduction of crime, improved traffic safety, more daylight outdoor playtime for the children and youth of our Nation, greater utilization of parks and recreation areas, expanded economic opportunity through extension of daylight hours to peak shopping hours and through extension of domestic office hours to periods of greater overlap with the European Economic Community.

(b) Section 3(a) of the Uniform Time Act of 1966 (15 U.S.C. 260a(a)) is amended by striking "last Sunday of April" and inserting in lieu thereof "first Sunday of April".

(c) Any law in effect on the date of the enactment of this Act—

(1) adopted pursuant to section 3(a)(2) of the Uniform Time Act of 1966 by a State with parts thereof in more than one time zone, or

(2) adopted pursuant to section 3(a)(1) of such Act by a State that lies entirely within one time zone, shall be held and considered to remain in effect as the exercise by that State of the exemption permitted by such Act unless that State, by law, provides that such exemption shall not apply.

(d)(1) Notwithstanding any other law or any regulation issued under any such law, the Federal Communications Commission shall, consistent with any existing treaty or other agreement, make such adjustment by general rules, or by interim action pending such general rules, with respect to hours of operation of daytime standard amplitude modulation broadcast stations, as may be consistent with the public interest, including the public's interest in receiving interference-free service.

(2) Such general rules, or interim action, may include variances with respect to operating power and other technical operating characteristics.

(3) Subsequent to the adoption of such general rules, they may be varied with respect to particular stations and areas because of the exigencies in each case.

(e) This section shall take effect 60 days after the date of enactment of this Act, except that if such effective date occurs in any calendar year after March 1, this section shall take effect on the first day of the following calendar year.

COMPREHENSIVE CRIME CONTROL ACT AMENDMENTS

THURMOND (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 1794

Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. HATCH, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. SPECTER, and Mr. EAST) proposed an amendment to the bill (S. 1236) to amend title 18 of the United States Code and other laws to make minor or technical amendments to provisions enacted by the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, and for other purposes; as follows:

On page 61, strike out lines 22 through 3 on page 62 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(1) In subsection (a)(2) by—

(A) redesignating subparagraphs (D) and (E) as subparagraphs (E) and (F), respectively;

(B) amending subparagraph (C) to read as follows:

"(C) the sentence modification provisions set forth in sections 3563(c), 3564, 3573, 3582(c), and 3583(e) of title 18;"; and

(C) adding after subparagraph (C) the following new subparagraph:

"(D) the fine imposition. provision set forth in section 3572 of title 18:";

On page 62, strike out lines 13 through 16 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(3) in subsection (b) by—

(A) inserting "(1)" after "(b)"; and

(B) designating the second sentence as paragraph (2) and inserting before the period in such paragraph (2) the following: "except that—

"(A) if the maximum term of the range is life imprisonment, the minimum shall not be less than 25 years imprisonment; or

"(B) if the maximum term of the range is one year or less, the maximum shall not exceed the minimum of that range by more than 50 per centum or 60 days, whichever is greater.";

On page 68, between lines 4 and 5, insert the following:

SEC. 16A. Section 213 of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984 is amended in section 3742 of title 18, United States Code—

(1) in subsections (a)(2), (b)(2), (d)(2), and (e)(1) by striking out "an incorrect" and inserting in lieu thereof "a clearly erroneous construction or"; and

(2) in subsection (e) by—

(A) striking out subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(B) designate the appropriate guideline category and remand the case for imposition of a sentence consistent with its decision;"; and

(B) striking out subparagraphs (A) and (B) of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(A) if it determines that the sentence is too high and the appeal has been filed under subsection (a), it shall set aside the sentence and remand the case for imposition of a sentence consistent with its decision;

"(B) if it determines that the sentences is too low and the appeal has been filed under subsection (b), it shall set aside the sentence and remand the case for imposition of a sentence consistent with its decision; or".

THURMOND AMENDMENT NO. 1795

Mr. THURMOND proposed an amendment to the bill S. 1236, supra; as follows:

On page 67, line 8, after "contract" insert ", subject to appropriations,".

NOTICE OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President I would like to announce, for the information of the Senate and the public, that the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources will hold an oversight hearing on the implementation of the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act of 1978. The hearing will focus on the growth of cogeneration and small power production since passage of the act, and on the need for any modifications to the act. Testimony will be received on the price paid by utilities for power from qualifying facilities, the effect of such purchases on the operation and reliability of utility systems, and the environmental impacts of construction and operation of qualifying hydroelectric facilities. The committee also invites testimony on other relevant issues.

The hearing will be held on June 3, 1986 beginning at 10 a.m. in room SD-366 in the Dirksen Senate Office Building in Washington, DC.

Those wishing to testify or to submit written statements should contact the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, room SD-358 Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC, 20510. Witnesses may be placed on panels, and are requested to submit 150 copies of their testimony 24 hours in advance of the hearing.

For further information, please contact David Doane or Gerry Hardy at (202) 224-5304.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, April 17, 1986, in order to conduct a hearing on the issue of white-collar crime, specifically the E.F. Hutton matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Finance be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, April 17, 1986, until 4 p.m. in order to markup H.R. 3838, the tax reform bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, April 17, to receive testimony on the posture of the U.S. Air Force.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Thursday, April 17, 1986, in closed executive session in order to conduct a hearing on special operations airlift forces.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

UNITED STATES BUILDUP OF MAINLAND CHINA'S MILITARY MACHINE

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I wish to commend Senator GOLDWATER for two recent statements in the RECORD on the policy problems we face with the administration's decision to sell sophisticated arms to the People's Republic of China. (See the RECORD for March 18, 1986 and for April 19, 1986. Senator GOLDWATER has flagged this important problem for us and has been keeping a watchful eye on a development which should give us all pause.

Mr. President, I am concerned about the turn that our China policy is taking. There is a disturbing trend here and the congressional oversight functions are not being exercised. Before we know it, we will have a brandnew China policy with very little input from the full U.S. Senate or from the responsible Senate committees. The American public has the right to know that there is an apparent trend in our China policy which has not been explained to them. Its implications are far reaching and must be aired properly and not conducted sub rosa behind closed doors at the Pentagon and the State Department and presented to the U.S. Senate as a fait accompli.

Mr. President, last fall we had the United States-China Peaceful Uses Nuclear Cooperation Agreement, which slipped past with barely a ripple. That agreement failed to include sufficient safeguards on United States origin nuclear material to be sold to China despite the fact that the Chinese might be able to reprocess that material and use the resultant plutonium to make bombs and weapons and to enhance the capacity of its nuclear navy. The agreement was full of holes and side promises which failed to comply with the letter of the law and the relevant provisions of the Atomic Energy Act and later legislation governing the sale of U.S. nuclear material abroad. We were told that the agreement complied with the spirit of the law, if not the letter, and that this would suffice. That assumption has yet to be tested.

Mr. President, now we have two proposals for big ticket arms transfers to the People's Republic of China, one a giant avionics sale and the other a sale of advanced naval systems. These planes and naval systems are items which the mainland Chinese could use against Taiwan and we have not assured ourselves against that. Selling $500 million worth of upgraded F-8 jet fighters to mainland China has policy implications which must be examined, especially when it follows on the heels of $98 million worth of munition, artillery, plant, equipment, and technology sales to China.

Mr. President, now we read in the press that there will be transfers of sophisticated naval systems to mainland China. We also hear that the Koreans, Japanese, and the ASEAN nations, close allies of ours in Asia, are very worried indeed about the implications of these sales for mainland China's military buildup. And so is Taiwan, which would be the most likely victim of mainland Chinese aggression. The Taiwan issue burns under the surface of current arms transfers to mainland China. And the administration has not come to grips with it. What does leak out of the China policymaking establishment in the administration is that the President supports these big and potentially dangerous arms sales to mainland China but we are not told why nor does anyone ask where this might lead us.

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to focus on these arms transfers to mainland China so that we are not surprised by any fait accompli. We don't want to wake up one day to find that mainland China has the most powerful nuclear navy in the world, the best military-industrial complex and air fighting force in Asia (all built with our help and technology), and then has turned this against Taiwan or some other of our close Asian allies. I urge the responsible committees of the Senate to examine carefully the path we are on and to ask whether or not we should be headed in that direction.

Please keep in mind that we still have solemn obligations to join in the defense of Taiwan. Are we funding the future confrontation between our ally Taiwan and the People's Republic of China? Will Americans be asked to fight and die confronting sophisticated weapons of American design and manufacture? Surely not if we maintain collateral strength in the Republic of China, but also surely so if we do not.

For these reason, Mr. President, I ask that the following article by Martin Lasater of the Heritage Foundation be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

WANTED: A U.S. POLICY FOR SELLING ARMS TO CHINA

The United States and the People's Republic of China (PRC) appear to be ready to agree on a $500 million arms sale package that would upgrade significantly by the F-8 jet fighter recently developed by Beijing. This pending Foreign Military Sales (FMS) deal may include such advanced avionics as heads-up display targeting panels, navigational instruments, and weapons fire-control systems. Together, the avionics package will give the F-8 the ability to fight in all types of weather. Under the agreement, the advanced U.S. electronic equipment would be sold to the PRC and then integrated and put together in the Chinese fighters by American defense contractors under U.S. Air Force supervision. While there may be good reasons for this sale, it highlights the troubling fact that the U.S. seems to have no guidelines for arms transfers to Beijing. Troubling too is that policymakers seem to be ignoring how the transfers will affect the security of the Republic of China on Taiwan.

The pending avionics sale would come close on the heels of the first FMS transfer to China, a $98 million deal announced last September including plans for an artillery munitions factory and technical specifications for 155mm projectiles. The U.S. already has sold the PRC civilian versions of the Sikorsky Black Hawk helicopter, General Electric LM2500 gas turbine engines for warships, Raytheon DE1167 towed sonar, and Mk 46 Mod 2 torpedoes. Currently under discussion are sales of General Electric F404 jet engines, Light Airborne Multipurpose System (LAMPS) MK-I anti-submarine warfare equipment, Improved Hawk and Standard surface-to-air missiles, and E-2C Hawkeye airborne early warning aircraft.

Strong resistance to the avionics package has come from some within the Administration because the PRC has refused to give assurances that it would not resell the acquired technology to third countries. The main advocates of the avionics sale are Pentagon aides. They argue correctly that the U.S. must help upgrade the equipment of China's People's Liberation Army (PLA) because the gap between China's military capabilities and those of Moscow's Asia-based forces is widening rapidly in the Soviets' favor. Because of this strong feeling in the Pentagon, the U.S. has been taking the lead in arms sales to Beijing. The Chinese apparently are not making weapons transfers fundamental to Sino-American relations.

Thus far, Washington policymakers have not set clear limits on what can be sold to the PRC. As a result, rivalry inside the Pentagon between the Army, Navy, and Air Force over establishing links with the PLA is pushing the quality and quantity of U.S. arms sales to China ever higher. This overlooks key developments. Among them:

(1) China is distancing itself from the U.S. strategically while improving relations with the Soviet Union.

(2) U.S. arms sales to China are opposed by China's noncommunist neighbors such as Japan, South Korea, and the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN). These countries fear that the weapons will be used to intimidate them rather than against the Soviet Union.

(3) The avionics sale would upset the delicate military balance in the Tawian Strait, which the U.S. is committed to preserve under the 1979 Taiwan Relations Act. Taiwan's defense depends solely on maintaining qualitative air superiority over the Strait. This would be threatened if China's F-8 fighters gain, as they would under the proposed sale, all-weather capability. Taipei has no modern all-weather fighters.

(4) The sale could threaten Taiwan's security in the long term. For one thing, it would give Beijing greater confidence that it could use military force to "resolve" the Taiwan issue. For another, it would weaken domestic investor confidence in Taiwan's future.

It is time for the Reagan Administration—or Congress—to set some sort of guidelines on arms transfers to the PRC. At the core of these guidelines must be the principle embodied by the Taiwan Relations Act: that the U.S. ensures that the Republic of China on Taiwan has the weapons to protect itself from military attack. This means that if the U.S. upgrades Beijing's offensive capabilities in a way posing a potential threat to Tawian, then Taipei's capabilities similarly must be upgraded. If the U.S. feels that because of China's confrontation with the USSR, it will be necessary to make the pending avionics deal, then Washington should also agree to sell Taipei a modern jet fighter such as the F-20 Tigershark or the F-16. Taipei has been trying to purchase such planes since 1978. Roughly half of Taiwan's fighter inventory are aging F-104's and early model F-5's slated for retirement.

Washington must define more clearly its arms sales policy towards the PRC; parameters, guidelines and ceilings must be set. In this, it would be appropriate for Congress to hold hearings. Without a clearer sense of direction coming from Washington, this issue could undermine the healthy consensus on U.S. China policy that the Administration has built.

USTTA REAUTHORIZATION BILL

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, earlier this week I introduced S. 2307, a bill to reauthorize the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration. Although a description of the bill and USTTA's functions appears on page S4291 of Tuesday's RECORD, the text of the bill was not printed. Because the text of the bill is both brief and informative, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The bill follows:

S. 2307

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the travel and tourism industry in the United States is vital to the economy of the Nation, and accounts for more than $240 billion in annual revenues, employs more than 5 million persons, and contributes to the international balance of payments by generating nearly $15 billion as an export; and

(2) the United States Travel and Tourism Administration serves a unique and vital role in the promotion of travel and tourism in the United States, by—

(A) coordinating travel and tourism activities of the Federal Government, State and local governments, and the private sector in order to optimize their contributions to economic prosperity, employment, and the international balance of payments;

(B) ensuring the compatibility of travel and tourism with other national interests, including historical and cultural preservation, energy development and conservation, environmental protection, and the judicious use of natural resources.

(C) eliminating unnecessary trade barriers to international operations of the United States travel and tourism industry;

(D) encouraging the free entry of individuals traveling to the United States in order to enhance international understanding and good will, consistent with immigration laws, laws protecting the public health, and laws governing the importation of goods into the United States;

(E) assisting in the collection, analysis, and dissemination of data which accurately measure the economic and social impacts of travel and tourism to and within the United States, in order to maximize the efficacy of planning in, and cooperative activities between, the public and private sectors; and

(F) harmonizing, to the maximum extent possible, all Federal activities in support of travel and tourism with the needs of the general public, the States, territories, local governments, and the travel and tourism industry, and providing leadership in the areas of travel, tourism, and national heritage preservation within the United States.

(b) It is therefore the purpose of this Act to provide authorization of appropriations for the United States Travel and Tourism Administration, in order that the Administration may continue its activities to promote travel and tourism in and to the United States.

SEC. 2. Section 304 of the International Travel Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2126) is amended by inserting immediately after "1982" the following: ", not to exceed $13,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987, not to exceed $14,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1988, and not to exceed $15,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1989".●

THE LIABILITY INSURANCE CRISIS

● Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, the Kentucky Derby is a grand old event dear to the hearts of people across the United States as well as natives of Kentucky. This year the Kentucky Derby Festival, which celebrates this event in Louisville, found its liability insurance yanked away. The director of the festival said, "We had a good claims record, but we were just a victim of what's happening everywhere."

However, at the 11th hour, the festival's long-time insurer reconsidered and agreed to provide coverage for the festival once again. But what will happen next year is anybody's guess.

Mr. President, the problems of the Kentucky Derby Festival are not unique. Festivals and similar special events across the country are scrambling to find insurers. Some are running "bare," that is, without any insurance, or are facing premiums which have jumped up by as much as 1,000 percent in some cases. This year, the lowest bid to provide insurance for Fiesta San Antonio was $85,000. Some festivals even face the prospect of cancellation. A single large civil award could bankrupt a festival.

Another difficulty festival organizers face is finding insurance for their officers and directors. Such coverage is disappearing and people are becoming reluctant to volunteer for positions on civic boards.

These problems are well presented in an article in the publication Business First of Louisville for the week of March 31 through April 6. The article, titled "Kentucky Derby Festival Dodges Bullet," provides the viewpoints of festival officials and insurance industry representatives on this situation.

Mr. President, an article in another publication reminds us that one private civil lawsuit was filed for every 15 Americans last year. Professionals such as pharmicists are feeling the bite of increasing liability rates and even cancellations of coverage despite their excellent insurance history.

People are pointing fingers of blame at excessive litigation, exorbitant judgments against too many individuals and mismanagement by insurance companies. The Small Business Legislative Council has made liability insurance its top priority. Members of that group recently told a congressional subcommittee, "We believe tort reform is necessary. The size of awards, the contingency fee arrangement, the methodology of class action suits, and probably most important, the causes of action available to plaintiffs, all add to the problem."

This situation is described in the March 1986 issue of NARD Journal, a magazine for independent pharmicists. The article is titled, "The crisis in liability insurance." It helps illustrate the reforms needed in our tort system, reforms which would bring relief to the problems Americans are facing in liability insurance.

These articles explain some of the problems I am attempting to solve in Senate bill 2046, the Litigation Abuse Reform Act of 1986, which I recently introduced. The bill is aimed at reforming our tort system, which directly affects liability insurance. The bill also seeks to bring damage awards back to the point of reason. As the first article points out, a single large award against a festival could wipe out the event forever.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask that these articles be printed in the RECORD.

The articles follows.

KENTUCKY DERBY FESTIVAL DODGES BULLET

(By Connie Dorval)

The good news: The Kentucky Derby Festival got 11th-hour liability insurance, so the show will go on.

The bad news: Its future hangs by a thread that insurers could yank, unraveling Louisville's popular festival and other special events across the country.

"What happens next year depends on what happens in the insurance industry," said Dan Mangeot, executive director of the Kentucky Derby Festival.

And it's anybody's guess what will happen in that volatile marketplace.

The rug was pulled out from under the Festival earlier this year when its insurer for 25 years canceled coverage. Louisville insurance brokers spent months scouring the country with no success looking for companies that would write the special-events coverage.

Then the Festival's long-time insurer had a change of heart and agreed to underwrite the events—this year.

"We had a good claims record, but we were just a victim of what's happening everywhere," Mangeot said. Although he is optimistic that the insurance will be renewed next year, he conceded that there are no guarantees.

Festivals across the country, unable to get liability protection, are running "bare"—without coverage—or are canceling their programs altogether. Skyrocketing rates—which have jumped as much as 1,000 percent—have eaten away at already-strapped budgets.

Also difficult is procuring insurance for officers and directors of special events, coverage that protects them from suits against their organizations. That coverage is rapidly disappearing, as underwriters refuse to renew policies or write new ones. Board members, understandably reluctant to bear the risks themselves, are forsaking corporate and civic rosters.

"The picture is pretty bleak," said Herb Melleny, executive vice president and managing director of the International Festivals association in St. Petersburg, Fla.

"Rates have absolutely gone out of sight," he said, and that puts another heavy burden on civic events whose budgets have already been trimmed. Insurance premiums have increased from 50 percent to 1,000 percent, he added.

At least one fair in Florida couldn't afford insurance this year and was canceled, and festivals in many other states have done the same, Melleny said.

Mangeot said the Derby Festival's premium this year is "nowhere near what we thought it would be." He expects it to be only about 30 percent higher than last year's—far less than the 500 percent to 600 percent increase he had been told to expect.

Mangeot refused to disclose the festival's premium.

But giant increases have become usual, said Melleny, who gave Fiesta San Antonio as an example. Last month, that festival's lowest bid was $85,000. "Events are having to look to corporate sponsors—any money, in fact, that they can beg, borrow or steal."

Liability affects every aspect of an event, he said, pointing to items such as the Cadillac Sevilles lent as official Derby Festival cars.

"Something has to happen," Melleny said, "the pendulum has to swing the other way if civic events are to survive."

What will happen if the Kentucky Derby Festival can't get insurance for next year?

Mangeot said that it may be possible to get coverage for certain events only, which would mean that some activities would run "bare" or be canceled.

Another lurking possibility is losing all insurance coverage—and that could halt all festivities.

A single large award would bankrupt the festival, said Mangeot. "We're a nonprofit organization and raise our own money." And without general liability insurance, he added, the festival's directors could be sued for any damages arising out of festival events.

The 62-member festival board has directors and officers (D and O) liability coverage through this year that protects them, but Mangeot said he doesn't know if the policy will be renewed next year.

Should both the festival and its directors fail to get insurance, it could signal the demise of the entire Kentucky Derby Festival.

The International Festivals Association, which has about 200 members in the United States, Canada, Australia and England, recently polled members about the liability problem. "All of them say D and O coverage is a problem. Nobody wants to serve without it," said Melleny.

But D and O coverage is scarce, says C.A. Lyles, director of excess and surplus lines at Alexander & Alexander of Kentucky Inc., which writes coverage for the Derby Festival.

Only about a dozen companies write D and O now, he said, compared with about three dozen a year ago. "Two-thirds of them just stopped writing it." Those who remain are so deluged with applications that "anyone with the slightest risk just won't get coverage."

"A director simply shouldn't serve on a board without D and O insurance," said Bill Pryor, vice president of marketing for K&K Insurance in Fort Wayne, Ind.

K&K, a Lloyd's of London correspondent that writes only special-events coverage, declined to insure the Kentucky Derby Festival or Churchill Downs.

"Frankly, underwriters are only interested in the very best risks. Someone who has had an unfortunate loss history won't get insurance," he said:

Underwriters look at the size of a group's losses as well as their frequency. In evaluating the risk, Pryor said, the underwriter throws out the largest loss—"shock loss"—in the last three years. If the loss history has been "clean" for two years, the underwriter is willing to discount the shock loss.

Underwriters look for a loss ratio of under 75 percent, he said, excluding the shock loss. If, for every premium dollar, more than 75 cents is paid out, the loss is considered too high.

Still, there are ways to improve chances of getting liability coverage, said Robert Collins, vice president of Johnson & Higgins of Kentucky Inc.

Groups can demonstrate improved controls to underwriters by identifying where losses have come from, making changes to prevent similar losses, and closely monitoring those changes to ensure against future losses.

"The problem with something like the Kentucky Derby Festival is that it isn't held at the Convention Center. It's held all over town," he said, noting that that makes control far more difficult. "It's going to be tough, real tough," Collins said.

"We go out of our way to make things safe," Mangeot said. "In a way, it's a good thing, because we're all becoming better risk managers. We've always been careful, but now we're even more careful."

Pryor said the insurance industry is cyclical, and he predicts the liability crunch will ease. However, he cautioned that insurance is a lot like mortgage rates.

"Mortgage rates are good now, a whole lot better than they were two years ago. But we'll never see 3½ percent interest rates like our parents did."

THE CRISIS IN LIABILITY INSURANCE

Physicians in some areas of the country are refusing to deliver babies. The reason? They can't get liability insurance. In New York state, a small town that has never been sued had its insurance cancelled. Why? Statistics convinced the insurance company municipalities are bad risks. The town found a new policy—at a 400 percent increase. The Southern California Rapid Transit District had no accidents last year, yet its insurance premium leaped from $67,000 to $3.2 million—a 4,700 percent increase in just one year.

CLOSED DUE TO NO INSURANCE

The United States faces a crisis that is having a devastating impact on businesses and individuals alike. Businesses both large and small, state and local governments, nonprofit organizations, professionals, and others are experiencing skyrocketing liability insurance rates or outright cancellations of coverage even for those with excellent insurance records.

The impact is widespread.

Although the federal government is largely self-insured, the National Park Service has closed down nearly a quarter of Yellowstone Park fearing that people will be mauled by bears. In Denver, sledding has been banned in city parks because the city cannot obtain liability insurance. Many municipalities are considering cancelling fireworks demonstrations this Fourth of July because liability insurance costs have become prohibitive.

Professionals like pharmacists are also feeling the crunch of increased professional liability rates and even cancellations of coverage. All this comes in spite of the fact that pharmacists overall have an excellent insurance history. The situation is worse for other professionals, notably physicians, who may spend weeks searching for insurance to cover them for only the next few months or pay astronomical premiums for limited protection. Retail pharmacists also face similar problems in obtaining commercial liability insurance for their stores.

The liability insurance crisis is even affecting some insurance agents who find it difficult to obtain "errors and omissions" coverage for their work.

ECONOMIC THREAT

As with most hotly political issues, the finger of blame points in many directions. But the key causes boil down to too much litigation and excessive judgments against too many individuals, and mismanagement by insurance companies.

The crisis has drawn the attention of the House Energy and Commerce Committee's Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation, and Tourism, chaired by Rep. James Florio (D-NJ), as well as numerous groups representing a broad spectrum of businesses and professionals.

"Insurance is a cost of doing business," the Small Business Legislative Council testified in a recent hearing held by the Commerce and Transportation Subcommittee. "When the cost of insurance doubles, triples, or quadruples, it takes a substantial bite out of the thin layer of income we call profit." The testimony by SBLC, of which NARD is an active member, noted that liability insurance is rapidly rising to the top of the list as a concern for all small firms.

"Premiums are increasing at exponential rates," SBLC testified. "Fifty, 70, and 150 percent increases are not unusual. Of greater concern, many firms are electing to go 'bare' and forgo any coverage. It is difficult to guess how long such a strategy will work."

In December, the SBLC and the Greater Washington Society of Association Executives held a meeting to discuss the issue with legal experts. The meeting underscores the fact that, when an issue touches all trade associations, they turn to the SBLC to help solve the problem. Member associations of the SBLC have contributed data on how the insurance crisis is affecting their respective industries.

"We believe tort reform is necessary," the SBLC told the subcommittee. "The size of the awards, the contingency fee arrangement, the methodology of class action suits, and probably most important, the causes of action available to plaintiffs, all add to the problem. A plaintiff can sue just about anybody remotely involved in a 'negligence' situation in search of a deep pocket."

The SBLC testimony acknowledged that "there are plenty of examples of wrongs made right only because of the system we have in place," but stressed that "the process has outpaced the 'economics' of justice. Society has to balance out individual protection against the need for a working economy." In its recent annual meeting, SBLC made liability insurance its top priority.

DEEP POCKETS

"The tort system is not a comprehensive social insurance plan." said Rep. John Porter (R-IL), testifying before Florio's subcommittee. "Not all wrongs can be righted through the tort system, and certainly not by dragging 'deep pocket' defendants with minimal fault into suits in hopes of large settlements." Porter, who was a key NARD ally in the recent Medicaid earned discounts fight, called for a cap on awards for noneconomic losses such as pain and suffering.

"Without a cap," said Porter, "and without a reasonable relationship between culpability and financial liability, we will soon be living in a world without insurance and full of bankruptcy and taxpayer revolts."

Porter, who is on the House appropriations subcommittee that provides funding for the Department of Health and Human Services, told the subcommittee that "We in Congress are being sought out at every turn by people at home who are shocked and bewildered by the sudden high cost or complete lack of liability coverage. This crisis touches every business, every professional person, every local government official, every consumer, and every taxpayer."

He noted that some small businesses face the Catch-22 of being required by law to carry insurance to operate and yet are unable to afford it.

Excessive litigation isn't the only source of the problem; the insurance industry is also being held accountable.

"We feel the insurance industry has played a role in the current crisis as well," SBLC testified. "Much of our concern is rooted in the belief that the insurance industry might have taken its eye off the ball—the insurance business. Mergers, acquisitions, and investments have stretched some companies further than they would like to admit. These problems, coupled with an overreaction to isolated incidents, have pushed premiums to their current level. We do not believe our claims record justifies the current premiums."

HEALTHY COMPETITION

In a recent statement, Senate Small Business Committee member Jim Sasser (D-TN) said that 10 percent of Tennessee businesses responding to a recent survey said they were closing their doors as a result of the liability insurance crisis. Some 50 percent of Sasser's survey respondents said the federal government should undertake "an immediate investigation of increases in commercial liability insurance to determine whether increases in rates have violated federal antitrust laws."

In 1945 Congress passed an amendment that exempted insurance companies from certain antitrust laws. In part, the exemption allows them to share claims data that may be used appropriately to help them determine insurance rates. But some in Congress believe these antitrust exemptions have allowed the insurance industry to operate without the same kind of competitive pressure that keeps other industries healthy.

"It may well be that we will have to reexamine many of the antitrust exemptions currently allowed in the property and casualty insurance industry," said Sasser.

COVERING BAD BETS

The insurance industry counters that part of the large rate increases they are passing along now are the result of strong competition and a bad bet on their part. They had expected that investments they made using insurance premiums during six years of high interest rates would allow them to lower rates to compete for policyholders. But the companies say they underpriced their policies, and now must make up for their losses by raising rates.

Harleyville Mutual Insurance Company President Bradford Mitchell, testifying before Senator John Danforth's (R-MO) Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, argued that net operating losses in the insurance business require rate increases and pointed to abuses of the tort system as the root of the problem. He echoed his industry's assertion that its financial problems are in part caused by "a fiercely competitive marketplace, contrary to our critics who claim there is no competition in the insurance industry."

Mitchell testified that last year there was one private civil lawsuit filed for every 15 Americans, and that inconsistencies in court decisions had destroyed the insurance industry's faith in the legal process. He also criticized current attempts to change tax laws that allow insurance companies to avoid paying taxes on revenues placed into reserve pools.

Trial lawyers, criticized for their role in the tort side of the crisis, in turn accuse the insurance industry of trying to gouge the public with big rate increases and compel legislators to pass laws beneficial to the insurance companies.

SEEKING SOLUTIONS

Senator Mitch McConnell (R-KY) has introduced legislation that, among other provisions, restricts damages that may be awarded in federal courts, requires periodic payments of awards of more than $100,000, and clarifies the standard used for the award of punitive damages.

McConnell, a former Judiciary Committee counsel, Department of Justice assistant attorney general, and county judge, noted that "we are all suffering from a progressively debilitating disease, the disease of hyperlexis—too much litigation. The result of all this litigation is predictable enough: higher prices for insurance, for goods and services, for medical care, and just about everything imaginable."

McConnell described cases where remotely involved individuals were forced to pay legal settlements, and where companies were held liable for unreasonable and unforseeable accidents. Corning Glass, for example, was forced to pay a man injured by a shard of glass $804,892 because a dish broke, said McConnell because the company failed to warn the owner that dishes might fall and shatter if stacked five deep with their lids inverted.

LIMITS ON LIABILITY

The legislation introduced by McConnell, the Litigation Abuse Reform Act of 1986 (S. 2046), is designed to open the debate on tort reform, he says. "The bill seeks to impose rational restrictions on the award of damages by federal courts," says McConnell, "and to impart a significant degree of predictability to the potential liability a defendant faces."

The legislation would accomplish this by capping pain and suffering awards at $100,000. Actual damages are not limited by legislation, but damages in excess of $100,000 would be paid on a periodic schedule determined by the court. The bill would also eliminate the "collateral source rule," which requires that damage awards be reduced by the amount of any other payments, such as insurance or workers compensation.

The legislation would also clarify the standard used for the award of punitive damages. "Punitive damages were never intended to compensate the plaintiff," said McConnell, "and their effect will be just as great if paid to the court, while removing the incentive for lawyers to pursue large punitive awards."

Two other important provisions of the legislation would limit the amount of contingency fees an attorney may obtain and create sanctions against lawyers who initiate a civil action either without a reasonable belief that there is good grounds for recovery or solely in anticipation of a monetary settlement. "This is perhaps the most egregious abuse of the civil justice system," said McConnell.

Other legislative remedies being discussed include establishing a federal presence in insurance regulation, proscribing mid-term cancellations of coverage except for good cause, determining what constitutes a reasonable limit on total awards for a single occurrence, and specifying that an insuror's total liability cannot extend beyond the limits of coverage for a particular occurrence.

Additional legislation addressing reforms in product liability insurance, including federal involvement, has been introduced by Senator Danforth, Christopher Dodd (D-CT), Bob Kasten (R-WI), and others. Enormous product liability awards are considered an important part of the larger crisis.

The SBLC's House testimony noted that most small business owners shudder at the thought of more federal regulation, and that the tort system and insurance regulation have traditionally been areas of state activity. As such, it pointed to action on the state level to address the crisis. SBLC has urged the president and Congress to establish a commission to develop recommendations for action.

In the meantime, rising liability insurance costs and cancelled or limited coverage will be borne on the shoulders of businesses and consumers in the form of higher prices, the chilling of the entrepreneurial spirit—and even the elimination of certain activities, goods, and services we all take for granted, but that are now too risky to provide.●

1986 CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues in the 1986 Congressional Call to Conscience. I commend my colleague, Senator MITCHELL, for his leadership role in chairing this year's Congressional Call to Conscience.

Edmund Burke, the 18th century British statesman and philosopher once said, "The only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men to do nothing."

We in Congress have a special obligation to act on the truth of Burke's words and speak out on behalf of the plight of Soviet Jews. Because the Soviet treatment of its Jewish population is evil. And it will not change unless we continue to insist that it must.

We must commit ourselves to continue this fight until every Soviet Jew who wants to leave has gone. We must make it a priority. Because as long as human rights are denied to the citizens of other countries, our freedom is in jeopardy.

By now many are aware of the grim fate the Soviet Union has mapped out for Soviet Jews. The plight of one of my adopted refuseniks, Yuli Edelshtein, is an all too familiar tale of persecution and harassment.

Yuli, as a 27-year-old resident of Moscow, was denied a visa because his father allegedly had access to secret materials. But Yuli had not seen his father in 20 years. To the Soviets, no pretext is too flimsy to be used to deny Jewish emigration.

After his application was denied, the KGB began to harass him, forcing him to leave his job as an English teacher. Yuli refused to be cowed by the KGB. He became an observant Jew, and began to teach Hebrew. The KGB could not tolerate Yuli's Jewish activism. He was convicted on trumped-up drug charges, and sentenced to 3 years at an especially harsh labor camp. Yuli's wife, Tatyana, reports that he is beaten continually, and prohibited from returning to his room to rest after work.

His real crime? The desire to live as a Jew, and to pass his heritage on to others.

Yuli Edelshtein is not an isolated case. My two other adopted refusenik families, the Ostrirovs and the Khassins, have also continually been denied permission to emigrate. Unfortunately, their plights are typical of countless thousands of other Soviet Jews. Forced to remain in the Soviet Union against their will, they cannot celebrate the holidays central to their faith without harassment. They cannot study Hebrew, learn Jewish history, or pass their heritage on to their children without great risk. The struggle to maintain any semblance of Jewish life requires extraordinary courage. And because Jews are prevented from passing along their Jewish traditions to their children, Judiasm risks extinction in the Soviet Union.

Even for nonobservant Jews, hostility and harassment are the daily fare. Many are arrested or imprisoned simply for trying to emigrate. Some lose their jobs, and are then arrested for not working. The doors of higher education are increasingly closed to Soviet Jews. And a quota system has resulted in a dwindling number of Jewish professionals.

But in this grim scenario, there is hope. We can make a difference. We already have. On February 11, Anatoly Shcharansky walked to freedom across the snowy Glienicke Bridge. The efforts of those around the world are partly responsible for his freedom.

But there is so much more to do. So many left to fight for. For Soviet Jews, there is nowhere to turn but to us.

Shcharansky left the Soviet Union not merely alive but free. His spirit was always free, even as the Soviets physically enslaved him. His heroic triumph in the face of incredible adversity should make us proud. It can inspire us to work even harder for those that remain.

This week, I introduced a bill to grant a Congressional Gold Medal to Anatoly "Natan" Shcharansky and his wife, Avital, for their courage and dedication to the cause of human rights. For Anatoly, because he acted to further the cause of Soviet Jews at great risk to himself. And for Avital, because of her tireless efforts to free her husband, and to elevate the cause of Soviet Jewry and human rights to a global concern.

Shcharansky is unusual. He will spend this year in Jerusalem without bitterness. Others may not be so lucky. For every Shcharansky who escapes, a Sakharov, an Edelshstein, an Orlov, remain. And there are thousands more whose names we do not know. Their names form a litany of sorrow. They are a testament to wasted lives, stolen dreams of freedom.

Those brave refuseniks and dissidents—condemned to live at the edge of society, fated to undergo ordeals we can barely imagine, rely on us. They rely on us to be their voice, to plead their case. To remember them. So that some day, some year, they can say, this year in Jerusalem, and really mean it.

Without our support, without our solidarity, that would never come to pass. They could not carry on. They would have no hope. As Elie Wiesel has written, What hurts the victim most is not the cruelty of the oppressor but the silence of the bystander.

We cannot be silent bystanders in this fight for basic human rights. We must speak out at every opportunity, protest the status quo in every forum. We must join Shcharansky, who, on his arrival at the Israeli airport, pledged "I am not going to forget those who I left in the camps, in the prisons, * * * who still continue their struggle for their right to emigrate, for their human rights.

We must raise our voices against Soviet tyranny along with Shcharansky. We must make it clear that continuing Soviet abuse will be met by a continuing outcry in the West.

The pressure must continue. Because Shcharansky's release is only that. The release of one heroic Jew who became more trouble than he was worth to the Soviets.

Some suggest that Shcharansky's release signals a relaxation of the Soviet policy on Jewish emigration. But I'll believe the Soviets have changed their emigration policy when they do. So far, the numbers speak for themselves. Only 1,140 Jews left the Soviet Union in 1985, compared to an average of 4,250 a month in 1979. And only 79 left in January.

But we can learn something from Shcharansky's release.

We pulled out all the stops for him. The efforts on his behalf were unprecedented in scope and intensity. No stone was left unturned, no argument unuttered. The fuss generated on his behalf indicated to the Soviets he was important to the West. And when they wanted to make a gesture, they chose him.

Shcharansky's case teaches us that we can make a difference. Our vigorous refusal to accept the situation as it is, can pay off. Those released are often people whose cases have been championed most diligently in the West.

The Soviet Union hears us. Would that we could generate an equal effort for every Soviet Jew who yearns to be free. We must keep the plight of Soviet Jewry on the superpower agenda for the next summit. Because as the summit gets closer, other issues may crowd out the human rights agenda. We must continue to make our voices heard in this vein. Early. And often.

I and 54 of my colleagues wrote to the President asking him to continue to put a high priority on raising Soviet Jewry at the summit. We have asked him to raise this issue not only at the next summit, but at the Helsinki Conference on Freedom of Human Contact this April, at the Helsinki Review Conference next November, and in every private forum possible.

We have a responsibility to ourselves and to this country to defy Edmund Burke's prophecy. Good people will not do nothing. We will not let evil triumph. We will overcome it together. For the Nudels, the Orlovs, and the Edelshsteins. For the others, less well known, who are counting on our efforts to bring them to freedom. And for ourselves.

I look forward to the time when we can do nothing, secure in the knowledge that freedom will prevail for Soviet Jews. But until that time, we will return, year after year, to plead the case. We can do no less.

I ask that a copy of the letter to the President be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, March 4, 1986.

President RONALD REAGAN,
The White House
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We applaud your efforts on behalf of Soviet Jewry, and are especially pleased at your success in helping to free Anatoly Shcharansky. We are writing to urge you to continue your efforts to bring freedom to the long suffering Jews of the Soviet Union.

With the Geneva summit behind us, it is not clear that any real change has occurred in the Soviet Union's emigration policy. Despite the release of a few prominent refuseniks, the hopes and prayers of people of good will everywhere for a reversal in that policy have thus far been unfulfilled.

In 1985, only 1,140 Jews were allowed to emigrate, while thousands still wait for permission. Only 79 Jews were allowed to leave the Soviet Union in January, compared to an average of 4,250 a month in 1979.

Forced to remain in the Soviet Union against their will, Soviet Jews face a grim fate. Many lose their jobs and are harassed or imprisoned simply as a result of attempting to leave. The doors of higher education are closed to many of them. Anti-semitism is part of the military indoctrination program in the Soviet Union, and anti-semitic programs have been shown on prime-time television.

Beatings, arrests, and jailings of Jews for attempting to practice their religion continue unabated. Persecution of unofficial Hebrew teachers continues. For example, on January 17, 1986, Leonid and Golda Rochlin of Leningrad, both Jewish teachers, were threatened by the KGB. On that evening, when seven of their pupils gathered to celebrate the Sabbath, the KGB interrupted their meal and two of the young men were beaten by the police. One woman was held overnight in prison. Only one of these seven could be called an activist. This incident, by no means atypical, illustrates that the struggle to maintain any semblance of Jewish social, religious or cultural life in the Soviet Union requires extraordinary courage.

We urge you to continue your efforts to seek freedom for all refuseniks and prisoners of conscience who desire to emigrate, and to seek freedom of cultural and religious expression for Jews and others who remain. We ask you to keep pursuing this goal in every international and private forum possible, including the Helsinki Conference on Freedom of Human Contacts, beginning April 15, the Helsinki Review Conference next November in Vienna, and of course, your next meeting with General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev.

We believe it is critical that the United States, which has long cherished liberty, continue to reach out to those who remain enslaved.

Sincerely,

FRANK LAUTENBERG,
(With 54 Cosponsoring Senators on this letter)

ANDREI SAKHAROV HONOR AND FREEDOM DAY

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, last night, I introduced legislation to proclaim May 21, 1986, as Andrei Sakharov Honor and Freedom Day. My resolution is Senate Joint Resolution 326. Its intent is to bring to the attention of the entire world the plight of Dr. Sakharov and, more importantly, to take meaningful steps which will register with the Soviet leadership the fact that the United States means business about Dr. Sakharov.

Mr. President, we have had resolutions on Dr. Sakharov for years and years now, all to no avail. My colleague, the distinguished Senator from New York, Mr. D'AMATO, the Chairman of the Helsinki Commission, introduced another such resolution this week. But without teeth. Mr. President, unless we clearly show the Soviets that there will be consequences for their noncompliance with the written promises they made to the world in the Helsinki Final Act which they signed in August 1975, there will be no action. There has been none for 11 years.

Mr. President, my resolution seeks to promote Dr. Sakharov's release from Gorky with a clear signal to Mr. Gorbachev of the areas we are looking at. I want him and the Soviet leadership to know that there will be consequences for their disdain and disregard of the agreements they sign. For that reason, Mr. President, I ask that the text of Senate Joint Resolution 326 be printed in the RECORD.

The text follows:

S.J. RES. 326

Whereas Dr. Andrei Sakharov is a world-reknowned brilliant Soviet physicist, father of Soviet magnetic nuclear fusion research, and winner of the Nobel Prize for Peace;

Whereas Dr. Sakharov is being detained by the KGB under house arrest in Gorky for his activities under legitimate provisions of the Helsinki Final Act and in violation of basic human rights and against all principles which govern civilized man;

Whereas Dr. Sakharov will attain his 65th birthday on May 21, 1986;

Whereas Dr. Sakharov is in need of immediate medical attention and his detention in Gorky has become a threat to his very survival;

Whereas Dr. Sakharov's imprisonment is contrary to the Helsinki Final Act, the Human Rights Convention of the United States, and all generally accepted principles of human rights;

Whereas by continuing Dr. Sakharov's imprisonment the Soviets demonstrate disdain and disregard for agreements they signed, for the opinion of the entire world and for the basic dignity of mankind;

Whereas Soviet willingness to cooperate with the West only in areas of their choosing such as cultural, literary or scientific exchanges does not acquaint them of their immoral failing to keep promises on human rights;

Whereas Dr. Sakharov's release is an objective to be earnestly sought and actively pursued by free men everywhere: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That—

1. May 21, 1986, be officially proclaimed Andrei Sakharov Honor and Freedom Day;

2. the President of the United States mark this day with an appeal to the First Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, Mikhail Gorbachev, to grant Dr. Sakharov's release;

3. hereinafter all official correspondence with the Soviet embassy in Washington, D.C. be properly addressed to "No. 1, Andrei Sakharov Plaza" in accordance with U.S. law;

4. the Department of State request that the Mayor of the District of Columbia move the "Andrei Sakharov Plaza" street sign from its current location 100 feet from the 1125 16th Street address to the city property located adjacent to that address, in compliance with the intent of Congress;

5. May 21, 1986, be recognized in the United States as a day to honor Dr. Sakharov by appropriate ceremonies in the Congress, the White House, and throughout our free land.●

DEDICATION OF THE PORTRAIT BUST OF CARL HAYDEN

(By request of Mr. DOLE, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a unique ceremony in the history of the U.S. Congress is taking place today in the Russell Senate Office Building adjacent to the room where the late Carl T. Hayden once had his office. At 4 p.m. today, a ceremony will be held by the Joint Congressional Committee on the Library to dedicate the portrait bust of Carl Hayden which was commissioned pursuant to Senate Concurrent Resolution 7 of the 98th Congress. I had the distinct privilege of authoring that resolution and seeing its approval by passage in the Senate on May 23, 1983, and passage in the House of Representatives on August 1, 1983.

Mr. President, the bust being unveiled today commemorates the truly unique service in the Senate and the Congress and the Nation by the man who for so many years was my senior colleague, Carl Hayden. Carl served in Congress from Arizona for a total of 57 years.

Carl Hayden became the first elected Member of the U.S. House of Representatives from Arizona in 1912 and he served there for the next 15 years. In 1926 he was elected to the Senate and served consecutive terms here for a total of 42 years until he retired in 1968. In fact, Carl Hayden served in the U.S. Congress longer than any other person in history.

Mr. President, the contributions and achievements of Carl Hayden are virtually unparalleled in history, although they are not well known because he always shared the credit and worked for results, not for the publicity. His legislative accomplishments included a joint authorship of the 19th amendment giving women the right to vote and a major role in setting up the original Interstate Highway System.

Carl Hayden's work was done for all practical purposes before legislation ever reached the Senate floor. He did not go in for flowery speeches aimed at the Press Gallery or the evening television news. He accomplished what he set out to accomplish for his State and the Nation and he did his real work in committee and behind the scenes.

Carl Hayden's family was among one of the original settlers who entered the Salt River Valley of Arizona, and he was born in the territory of Arizona 35 years before it became a State. There is no one more qualified to receive this honor than the late Senator Hayden.

Mr. President, I ask that the official program of the ceremonies may appear in the RECORD.

The program follows:

[The dedication of the portrait bust of The Honorable Carl Trumbull Hayden, United States Representative, 1912 to 1927, United States Senator, 1957 to 1969, President Pro Tempore of the Senate, 1957 to 1969, on Thursday, April 17, 1986, at 4:00 p.m., elevator lobby, Northwest Corner, first floor, Russell Senate Office Building]

PROGRAM

INVOCATION

The Rev. Dr. James D. Ford, Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

INTRODUCTION

The Honorable Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., chairman, Committee on Rules and Administration, vice chairman, Joint Committee on the Library, accompanied by The Honorable Frank Annunzio, chairman, Committee on House Administration, chairman, Joint Committee on the Library.

DISTINGUISHED GUESTS

The Honorable Strom Thurmond, President Pro Tempore of the Senate; The Honorable Robert Dole, Republican Leader of the Senate; The Honorable Robert C. Byrd, Democratic Leader of the Senate; The Honorable Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., Speaker of the House of Representatives; The Honorable James C. Wright, Jr., Democratic leader of the House of Representatives; The Honorable John J. Rhodes, former minority leader, U.S. House of Representatives.

UNVEILING

Mr. Hayden C. Hayden, nephew of the late Senator Hayden and Mr. Larry Hayden nephew of the late Senator Hayden assisted by The Honorable George M. White, FAIA, Architect of the Capitol and by the sculptor, Stafford Rolph.

REMARKS

The Honorable Barry Goldwater, U.S. Senate; The Honorable Dennis DeConcini, U.S. Senate; The Honorable Morris Udall, U.S. House of Representatives; The Honorable Bob Stump, U.S. House of Representatives.

BENEDICTION

The Rev. Dr. Richard C. Halverson, Chaplain of the Senate.●

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF RITA STEINBERG

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, when Rita Steinberg of Louisville, KY, joined the National Council of Jewish Women 20 years ago, she began an impressive record of accomplishments and community service.

As a local council officer, she initiated an annual sale of donated used clothing which grossed $7,500 its first year, 1976. Last year, the event garnered nearly $159,000. When she later became president of the Louisville section of the NCJW, she made membership a priority for the organization. The NCJW consequently saw its ranks jump from 860 members to more than 1,000. Mrs. Steinberg then became a national board member of the NCJW and helped a section in Chicago start its own clothing sale. That section's first sale took in $40,000 its first year.

Mrs. Steinberg has also served her community as commissioner of the Louisville and Jefferson County Human Relations Commission and as a board member of Kentucky Youth Advocates.

Now she works full time as executive director of the Kentucky Art and Craft Foundation, a nonprofit organization providing educational and promotional opportunities for the State's artisans.

Mrs. Steinberg's contributions to her community have not gone unnoticed. Sunday, April 20, I will have the honor of presenting, on behalf of the Louisville section, the Hannah G. Solomon Award to Mrs. Steinberg for her endeavors.

A recent column by Joan Kay of the Louisville Courier-Journal describes Mrs. Steinberg's accomplishments and captures her spirit of service. Mrs. Steinberg says in the article that through her work in NCJW, "I've had a feeling all the time that my life had meaning—that what I was doing was making a difference in the world."

Mr. President, I ask that this article, which tells the story of Mrs. Steinberg's work so well, be printed in its entirety.

The article follows:

COMMITMENT PAYS OFF FOR RITA STEINBERG AND WOMEN'S COUNCIL

(By Joan Kay)

Twenty years ago, nudged by her family, Rita Steinberg joined the National Council of Jewish Women, Louisville Section.

Her aunt, Sylvia Goldstein, was very active in the group and "probably paid for my first membership," said Mrs. Steinberg. "My husband's aunt in St. Louis was a national board member at the time so I was bombarded from all sides."

Mrs. Steinberg had hoped to make new friends. She found those all right and much more. Through working on NCJW projects that benefited the community, "I've had a feeling all the time that my life had meaning—that what I was doing was making a difference in the world."

Sunday the Louisville Section will recognize Mrs. Steinberg's contributions by presenting her with the Hannah G. Solomon Award.

The award is given "to someone who has shown dedication to improving the lives of children, the aging and women," says Renee Loeb, president of the Louisville Section.

Mrs. Steinberg's "devotion to community causes is just incredible. She was able to set a vision and was able to convince people they wanted to be part of it. She strives for the best and lets people know that is the standard."

Mrs. Steinberg remembers that her first volunteer assignment was helping a fifth-grade class put on its first play. At the time the organization sponsored many enrichment programs in public schools.

"It was a lot of fun. That's really what turned me on."

She soon moved to more of an administrative role as assistant treasurer and then treasurer of the section. "You really learn about an organization when you are treasurer because you know everything they are doing. You write all the checks."

One name she wrote on checks was the California Day Care Center, now called the California Area Family Development Center. The section covered the center's operating deficit and in 1971 put up $4,000 as seed money for a federal grant.

"I was impressed because I saw something really great we were doing," said Mrs. Steinberg.

As vice president of ways and means 10 years age, she started what would become a very profitable fund-raising event: Fashion Encore, an annual sale of donated used clothing.

Similar sales had been held with great success by NCJW sections in other cities.

Some Louisville members were leery of the idea, fearing that the sale would compete with the section's Nearly New Shop, a used-clothing store operated year round at 815 E. Market St.

They were also apprehensive that the Louisville group might not have enough members to handle the sale.

It took a year to convince the leadership that the project had promise, and the cash registers first rang in 1978. That sale grossed $7,500. Last fall's Fashion Encore grossed nearly $159,000.

Several years ago operation of the shop and the sale were merged, and nowadays the Louisville Section disburses more than $100,000 a year to community agencies and organizations.

The section's newest commitment to elderly people is NCJW ParkSide, a non-sectarian, adult day center that offers activities from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. weekdays. It opened in January at 2101 Ellerbe Ave.

The section is the major supporter, but grants have been received from other sources.

As president of the organization in 1979-81. Mrs. Steinberg set a goal of increasing membership. "We were so into public affairs and community services that we had neglected membership.

"I wrote letters to everyone I knew who wasn't a member. People said they hated to see me coming at a party."

During her term, membership jumped from about 860 to more than 1,000. "Now we have over 1,100."

While she was a NCJW national board member, Mrs. Steinberg was sometimes a thrift-shop trouble-shooter and she helped a section in Chicago start a clothing sale, which took in $40,000 its first year.

In community posts outside the section, she has been a commissioner of the Louisville and Jefferson County Human Relations Commission and a board member of Kentucky Youth Advocates.

A native of Louisville, Mrs. Steinberg is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Mace Hymson. She and her husband, Larry, a partner in Touche Ross & Co., have a son, Scott, 19, a sophomore at Yale University, and a daughter, Laura, 16, a sophomore at Ballard High School.

Mrs. Steinberg now works full time as executive director of the Kentucky Art and Craft Foundation, a non-profit organization that provides education and promotional opportunities for the state's craftsmen.

At its base at 609 W. Main St., the foundation stages exhibitions and operates a crafts shop.

Mrs. Steinberg's main job is raising money for the foundation from memberships, corporate donations and grants. And she loves her plunge into the creative outpourings of Kentucky's artists, surrounded in her office by pottery, a carved rooster and a fabric hanging.

"It's a whole new world for me. I buy things all the time, particularly jewelry."

The Solomon award will be presented at the Louisville Section's annual meeting at 7:30 p.m. Sunday at The Temple, 5101 Brownsboro Road. The gathering is open to the public, and the presentation will be made by U.S. Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., a friend of the Steinbergs.

It seems a little strange to Mrs. Steinberg to be receiving as award from an organization "that has done so much for me. I can't imagine any course, any college, where I could have learned what I learned working in the section."

She credits the NCJW for the skills she acquired in management, public relations, dealing with people and budgeting.

"I never loved anything like I loved the section. It's wonderful to be honored by people you love and respect the most."●

TERRORISM

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, in the past few weeks, this Nation's attention has been focused on international terrorism: What it consists of, who is behind it, and what can be done about it.

This week the United States responded forcefully to Libyan terrorism by staging a limited air assault on Libyan facilities that support international terrorism. This, I believe, is the beginning of a policy that will deal effectively with the threat of terrorism. The war on terrorism is not over with this one raid. It has just begun. We as leaders of this Nation must realize from the start that this policy, of not giving in to terrorists and of punishing them for their gratuitous acts of violence, must be sustained over a long period of time if it is to have any chance for success. We are dealing with a determined adversary, one that possesses great resources. But this Nation, and the entire Western World, has greater resources and, I believe, a greater capacity for moral courage than our enemies.

While we are all reflecting on this problem, let me commend to you a superb article on terrorism and how the West can beat it by Israeli Ambassador to the United Nations, Benjamin Netanyahu. He writes from the special perspective not only of an Israeli citizen, whose country has been all too often the victim of terrorist attacks, but with the personal experience of having lost a loved one in the execution of a sound antiterrorist policy that he knows to be right: Ambassador Netanyahu's brother, Jonathan, was the leader and only casualty of the daring Israeli commando force that rescued all but 3 of the more than 100 hostages held captive aboard a hijacked airliner at Entebbe.

This article is full of penetrating insights into the nature of terrorism and compelling arguments, both moral and practical, for continuing the policy that this Government has undertaken in its response to Colonel Gadhafi's murderous attack on a Berlin discotheque.

Mr. President, I ask that this article, from the April 14, 1986, edition of Time magazine, be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

TERRORISM: HOW THE WEST CAN WIN

(By Benjamin Netanyahu)

The realization that wild beasts prowl our airways and waterways, that they can escape retribution by fleeing to countries that respect, indeed worship, the law of the jungle, has steadily been replacing our older conception of justice, order and accountability in international affairs.

So writes Benjamin Netanyahu, Israel's Ambassador to the United Nations, in a forthcoming book whose assertive title sums up its argument—Terrorism: How the West Can Win (Farrar, Straus & Giroux; $18.95). The book grew out of a 1984 meeting of international officials and experts in Washington that explored the question: Just what can be done to stop terrorism?

The West's failure to answer the question was underscored once again last week when a terrorist bomb tore a hole in the fuselage of a TWA 727 en route from Rome to Athens. The explosion killed four American passengers, who were sucked out of the plane and fell 15,000 ft. to their death. Libya's Muammar Gadhafi disclaimed responsibility, but concern remained high that he would attempt to exact revenge—sometime, somewhere—for the U.S. Sixth Fleet's bloodying of his forces.

Netanyahu, a former soldier, businessman and the editor of Terrorism, has a strong personal reason for his concern with the subject. He is the younger brother of Lieut. Colonel Jonathan Netanyahu, leader of the daring Israeli commando force that rescued all but three of the more than 100 hostages held captive aboard a skyjacked airliner at Entabbe, Uganda, in 1976. The Israelis lost only one of their men during the raid, but that was Jonathan Netanyahu, shot dead at the age of 30 by an airport guard. Ambassador Netanyahu, who organized the Jonathan Institute to fight terrorism, sees in the overall results of Entebbe a lesson to be widely applied today. Though some will surely find his prescriptions too tough and will quarrel with his refusal to give undue weight to the root causes of terrorism, the fact remains that no Israeli plane has been seized in the ten years since Entebbe. What follows is excerpts from his introduction and essay, along with a selection of brief quotes from other contributors to the book.

International terrorism is not a sporadic phenomenon born of social misery and frustration. It is rooted in the political ambitions and designs of expansionist states and the groups that serve them. Without the support of such states, international terrorism would be impossible.

Access to the media is also indispensable. First the terrorists seize our attention by committing a brutal act. Only then does the real performance begin: the communiqués, the parading of dazed hostages before the cameras, the endless interviews in which the terrorists are respectfully asked to explain their demands and conditions. Slowly, imperceptibly, the initial horror recedes, and in its place comes a readiness to accept the terrorist point of view.

We are asked to shed our normal revulsion for murderous acts and accept the notion, endlessly repeated, that "one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter." This is precisely what the terrorist would like us to believe. It is completely untrue. At the risk of belaboring the point, I offer a formal definition: Terrorism is the deliberate and systematic murder, maiming and menacing of the innocent to inspire fear for political ends. This distinction lies at the heart of the matter. For without a clear understanding of terrorism, the problem cannot be tackled.

Terrorists habitually describe themselves as "guerrillas," but guerrillas are not terrorists. They are irregular soldiers who wage war on regular Military forces. Terrorists choose to attack weak and defenseless civilians: old men, women and children—anyone in fact except soldiers if terrorists can avoid it.

This indeed is one of terrorism's most pernicious effects: it blurs the distinction between combatants and noncombatants, the central tenet of the laws of war. It is not only that the terrorist breaks down this standard but that we begin to accept his standards. With each fresh attack, the public is conditioned—first by the terrorists, then by their complaint interpreters in the press—to equate innocent hostages with jailed terrorists and to accept the notion that the murder of children is a regrettable but understandable expression of the terrorists' purported grievances.

There are those who say that war is war and that any attempt to define ethical limits is futile. But short of the rare and difficult case of total war, such as during World War II, most people would agree that there is a significant difference between waging war on armed combatants and attacking defenseless civilians. None of the resistance movements in Nazi-occupied Europe conducted or even condoned, terrorist attacks against German noncombatants, such as officers' wives or children. Without such distinctions, the concept of war crimes loses any meaning. For if everything is permissible, why not gas innocent people or machine-gun children?

It is here that the terrorist parts company with humanity. He declares a total war on the society he attacks. For him everyone is a legitimate target. A baby is fair game, he may, after all, grow up to be a soldier. So is the baby's mother, she gave birth to this future soldier. No one is spared, ordinary citizens and leaders alike.

Having defined all of society as a field of combat, the terrorist demands that his activity, which would ordinarily be viewed as gangsterism, be treated with the respect given to legitimate warfare. That is why he often takes on all the trappings of a soldier; that is why he issues "communiques" instead of simple statements and why he insists that his jailed accomplices, who are in fact dangerous criminals, be accorded the status of prisoners of war.

Though terrorism as such is not new in history, or even in this century, today's terrorism differs in its extent and its violence; it now attacks the territory and citizens of nearly all the democracies. It began its rapid growth in the 1960s. It was sparked by the early success of two groups of terrorists: the P.L.O., which introduced airline hijackings as an international weapon, and European radical factions, which carried out increasingly bold bombings, kidnapings and assassinations throughout the Continent. Terrorist groups, seemingly independent from one another, soon proliferated throughout Europe, Japan, North and South America and the Middle East. But as the evidence piled up, the Arab P.L.O., the Iranian mujahedin, the Armenian A.S.A.L.A., the German Baader-Meinhof gang, the Italian Red Brigades, the Japanese Red Army and others were often found to be linked not only to one another but to the Soviet Union and radical Arab regimes. Only after the P.L.O.'s expulsion from Beirut did captured P.L.O. documents reveal the role of its terrorist ministate in Lebanon as a training center and launching ground for what had become a kind of terrorist international.

This collaboration between Marxist and Muslim radicals is not accidental. Modern terrorism has its roots in two movements that have assumed international prominence in the second half of the 20th century: Communist totalitarianism and Islamic (and Arab) radicalism. These forces have given terrorism its ideological impetus and much of its material support. Both legitimize unbridled violence in the name of a higher cause, both are profoundly hostile to democracy, and both have found in terrorism an ideal weapon for waging war against democracy.

Indeed, international terrorism is overwhelmingly an extension of warfare sustained and supported by the states built on the foundations of Marxism and radical Islam. The Soviet Union, several of its East European satellites, Cuba and North Korea, and Middle Eastern states such as Libya, Iran, Syria, Iraq and South Yemen have given terrorists weapons, training and money. They have also provided sanctuary, safe passage and safe houses—often their very embassies. And they have supported terrorism on the crucial political level, legitimizing it and blocking international measures against it.

Why have certain radical states begun to resort to terrorism? Since the end of World War II and the dawn of the nuclear age, the waging of war has become increasingly expensive and risky. For a superpower like the Soviet Union a direct confrontation with the West entails the unacceptable risks of atomic war. For smaller states, conventional war can also escalate into intolerable conflict or outright defeat. Terrorism is part of the broader trend toward waging war by proxy. It permits regimes to engage in aggression while evading responsibility or retaliation.

As the number of attacks has increased tenfold in the past decade alone, a clear pattern has emerged. The targets of terrorism have been, more and more, Britain and Germany, Spain and Portugal, France and Italy, Israel and Japan, and, above all, the U.S. (whose nation accounted for roughly a third of terrorism's victims since 1968)—in short, the West. A network of professional terrorists seeks to weaken and demoralize democratic societies by attacking their citizens, their leaders, their institutions, thereby disrupting their way of life and sapping their political will. And it is a growing threat. Terrorist attacks now kill and injure not one or two but hundreds at a time. Few doubt that other, more lethal, weapons may be employed in the future.

The terrorist's strategy is premised on the ability to deliver future blows, no matter what. The fear and intimidation that terrorism thrives on are totally dependent on this threat. The primary task in fighting terrorism, then, is to weaken and ultimately destroy the terrorist's ability to launch attacks. This is often presented as a difficult or even impossible task. It is asserted that the clandestine nature of terrorism and the openness of Western societies make terrorism against the West nearly impossible to root out. I would argue the exact opposite. Terrorism can be stopped. The minute you weaken its ability to deliver repeated blows, you have broken its back, and it is well within the means of the West to achieve this.

Condiser, for example, the classic terrorist act, the taking of hostages. More than any other act of terrorist violence, it reveals two underlying characteristics of terrorism. First, it is an unmistakably deliberate assault on the people who are seized, precisely because they are noncombatants. Second, it affords a stage for dramatization and distortion. Hostages taking places a government in a terrible delimma: if it use force to release the hostages, it might end up with more people killed than if it gives in. If it yields, the terrorists emerge victorious. Sometimes the terrorists resolve this delemma by killing a few hostages and threatening to murder the rest if their demands are not met. The government can then argue that since more hostages are about to be killed, it must take action immediately.

But suppose the terrorists have not started killing hostages. Should they not fear a forceable response? The more terrorists believe that military intervention is likely, the less prone they will be to continue their seige. In the hijacking of both the TWA airliner out of Athens last summer and the cruise ship Achille Lauro last fall, a principal reason that the terrorists released their hostages was their belief in imminent intervention—retaliation afterward in the case of the airline and military rescue of the Achille Lauro (both American and Italian forces were poised to storm the ship on the day the pirates surrendered).

Terrorists have often escaped because of the sloppiness of the West's thinking about the use of force. America's loss of clarity in the wake of Viet Nam has become a general Western malaise. The rules of engagement have become so rigid that governments often straitjacket themselves in the face of unambiguous aggression. But a fundamental principle must be recognized under no circumstances should a government categorically rule out a military response simply because of the risk of civilian casualties. There is a practical and a moral basis for this position. In practical terms, an inflexible rule against risking civilian casualties would make any military action virtually impossible. In moral terms, an absolute prohibition on civilian casualties today condemns to death or injury many future victims. Terrorism, undeterred, will inevitably increase.

Responsible governments seek to minimize civilian casualties. But they do not grant immunity to an aggressor simply because their response might endanger civilians. If this is true in normal combat, it is truer still in the case of terrorism. An absolute prohibition on civilian casualties provides the terrorist with an invincible shield. This is not only true in cases which he fears retaliation following his attacks (for example, when the terrorist seeks immunity by planting his bases among civilians). It is also true during the taking of hostages, when the terrorist even more brazenly seeks the authorities to risk the lives of innocent victims by taking action.

Terrorists generally do fear military intervention, and that fear has a tremendous inhibiting effect on hostage taking. This is best demonstrated in the case of Israel. No other nation suffered more from this form of attack. In the 1970s Israel experienced a large number of hostage takings, including the hijacking of planes and the seizing of schools, apartments, hotels and buses. In all these cases, the government refused to capitulate to the terrorists' demands. Soldiers overcame the terrorists and liberated the hostages. This was by no means an easy course to follow. The government painfully recognized that its policy made some civilian casualties unavoidable; in 1974 at Ma'alot, 21 schoolchildren were massacred by the P.L.O. before the terrorists were themselves killed.

But the result of this determined refusal to yield was that hostage taking gradually became a rarity inside Israel. This was not because the P.L.O. was unable to stage such incidents but because it finally realized that there would be no surrender and that the terrorists would fail and probably be killed. Contrary to popular myth, cases of suicidal terrorism are rare; overwhelmingly, terrorists want to live, to escape unpunished.

The P.L.O. sought to overcome Israel's resolve by seizing Israeli planes or hostages outside Israel. But these attempts were defeated as well. In the most celebrated example, the case of Entebbe, Israeli troops flew more than 2,000 miles, liberated the hostages and killed their captors. For a decade afterward, not a single Israeli or Israel-bound plane was hijacked, and virtually no attempts were made to seize Israeli hostages abroad.

The refusal to capitulate and the decision to apply force were adopted in several important instances by other governments. The German government forcibly liberated German hostages on the hijacked Lufthansa airplane in Mogadishu in 1977, the Dutch successfully stormed a train hijacked by the South Moluccans (1977), and the British freed the occupied Iranian embassy in London (1980). For some time afterward, these countries experienced no further hostage takings. Far from endangering a cycle of increased violence, the application of military force or the prospect of such application inhibits terrorist violence.

The only sensible policy for attacked governments, then, is a refusal to yield and a readiness to apply force. This is a policy that says to the terrorist, I will not accept your demands. I demand that you release the hostages. If you do not do so peacefully, I am prepared to use force. I am proposing a simple exchange your life for the lives of the hostages. The only "deal" I am willing to make with you is that if you surrender peacefully, I will not kill you.

Obviously, there can be complicating circumstances. What if military intervention truly does endanger the lives of most or all of the hostages? Ths is not quite as frequent as might at first appear. Many governments have specialized forces trained to overcome terrorists before they kill most of their hostages.

Rescuing hostages requires impressing on military forces the importance of minimizing firepower. In storming a building, the normal military procedure is to shoot first and look later. But in rescuing hostages, the soldiers' job is exactly the opposite: they must look first and shoot later, and even then only when it is absolutely necessary. Sometimes they fail, as in last year's attempt in Malta. But as the experience of Israel, West Germany, Britain and Holland shows, more often than not such specially trained units succeed.

Suppose the terrorists have not merely seized hostages but have hidden them? Perhaps the most celebrated case is the kidnaping of Italy's former Prime Minister Aldo Moro by the Red Brigades. Italy refused to capitulate, and Aldo Moro was murdered. As tragic and painful as the decision was, it was the right one, as was the firm Italian policy in the immediate aftermath of the Moro kidnaping. Unlike the weakness it later showed during the Achille Lauro affair, the Italian government mounted a vigorous effort to hunt down the Red Brigades and improve the effectiveness of its security forces. By the time of the next major kidnaping, that of General James Dozier, it was able to apprehend the terrorists and liberate their hostage. Whether or not such rescue is possible governments must persist in refusing to capitulate.

Perhaps the most complicated case of hostage taking is that in which the terrorists find refuge in the territory of a country hostile to the West. Short of declaring war, what can be done? It is often difficult, though by no means impossible, to launch a limited military operation to rescue the hostages. In any case, the principle remains the same—the refusal to yield and the threat of intervention or retaliation. Retaliation can take several forms, against the terrorists themselves and the governments that shelter them. The main point is that both the terrorists and their governmental patrons must believe that they will eventually be punished (preferably sooner rather than later).

What is true of hostage taking is true of other forms of terrorism. The terrorist always considers, and fears, a forceful response from his victims' government. To the extent that he believes he will be tracked down and punished, he will curb them. Deterrence works on terrorists just as it does on anyone else.

Terrorists may at first respond to a government's policy of firmness with an acceleration of violence, but they usually cannot withstand a sustained and resolute policy of resistance and active pursuit. Retaliation and pre-emption against terrorism are thus acts of self-defense. Denying the necessity for such self-defense, and blurring the moral basis for it, is dangerous. It undermines a basic principle on which government authority is based. A government's first obligation is to protect its citizens. Confusion or vacillation fools no one, least of all terrorists.

One point is central: international terrorism as we know it would simply not be possible without the collaboration of governments that have used terrorism to wage hidden war against their adversaries, especially the West. After the Achille Lauro piracy, Abul Abbas, its mastermind, skittered from Egypt to Italy to Yugoslavia to Iraq to South Yemen, where he finally found his most suitable haven. Without the collusion or acquiescence of friendly or passive governments, he would have been caught and brought to trial. The support of friendly regimes and the passivity of others are the crucial assumptions under which international terrorism operates.

Just as hostile governments have caused the internationalization of terror, they are also the key to its end. For states are no less susceptible than the terrorists they support to a sober calculation of costs and benefits. The very reason certain regimes rely on terrorists is to be able to wage war without the risks that war entails. As long as they are successful in denying complicity or involvement, they will easily escape retribution.

Once this is understood, the democracies can begin to act effectively in three broad areas against offending states.

POLITICAL PRESSURES

These could range from international condemnation to cutting off diplomatic relations (as the U.S. and Britain did with Libya). Political pressures signal to the terrorist state that the victim not only is unwilling to yield but is prepared to expose the offender to public censure. This could force other states to take a position against the offender, or at least to curb their support for it. Since many states sponsoring terrorism depend on the ability to deny complicity in terrorist crimes, this is not a minor threat. In the severance of diplomatic relations, an added penalty is the shutting down of embassies. Terrorists simply cannot sustain a concerted campaign of attacks in most Western countries without sanctuary or inviolable means of passing funds, arms and intelligence.

The embassies and diplomatic pouches of Syria, Iraq, Iran, Libya, South Yemen and other Middle Eastern states, as well as Soviet bloc embassies, have turned parts of Western Europe into a veritable playground of terrorists. Weapons, passports, money, safe houses have all been made available to terrorists by people hiding behind diplomatic immunity. Without embassies, the effectiveness of terrorism in the West would be sharply diminished.

ECONOMIC PRESSURE

Most of these countries desperately need Western goods, weapons or credit. There are certain sophisticated products, including advanced weapons, that only the West can supply. If the democracies used but a fraction of their enormous economic clout, they could cause regimes supporting terrorism to rethink some of their activities.

Economic pressure could be a combination of boycott and embargo. In the case of Libya, a prime offender, the U.S. has willingly forfeited hundreds of millions of dollars of trade to send an unmistakable and economically painful message to that regime. Another potent sanction that can be readily applied is the denial of landing rights in major Western capitals to the commercial planes of terrorist states. The same could apply to docking rights for the ships of offending states.

MILITARY ACTION

This cannot be ruled out, nor should we be bashful about discussing it. When we talk about using military force, we must first consider unilateral action, one state's taking action against terrorists or a state that shelters them. Obviously, if a terrorist action occurs on a government's own soil, it will take action to protect its own citizens and foil the terrorists.

But what about a terrorist attack on a country's citizens abroad, in embassies, businesses or airlines? In the case of a hijacking, piracy or other hostage taking, the responsibility of securing the release of the hostages is that of the government on whose soil (or ship or plane) the incident takes place. One would hope such governments would adopt a firm policy against the terrorists, but if a government cannot or will not undertake forcibly to end a hostage crisis, it forfeits a certain measure of jurisdiction. The country whose nationals (or plane or ship) are held hostage has the right to act when the host country refuses to do so. Take the cae of Entebbe. Uganda had an obligation to intervene and end the hijacking. When it refused to do so, the right to act passed to Israel and France (most of the passengers were Israeli; the plane was French). Since France was not considering any military move (although it helped in gathering intelligence), Israel had a perfect right to act.

This is at odds with a widely held view that national sovereignty is absolute and cannot be violated. But of course it is not absolute. Countries do not have the right to do anything within their borders. They risk the intervention of other states if they fail to live up to elementary international obligations.

Sovereignty does not in any way preclude a government from allowing another government to assist in or carry out a rescue operation, as, for example, the Somalis did when they approved the intervention of West Germany's antiterrorist unit in the Mogadishu incident. In most cases, therefore, even weak or hesitant governments have a choice. Bluntly put, they can either do it themselves or let someone else do it.

What about the use of force in circumstances other than hostage taking? Western governments already possess ample intelligence evidence (such as satellite photos of training camps, interception of communications, reports from agents in the field) of continuous support for terrorists from certain governments. Such a record of complicity is more than strong enough to justify punitive action against these criminal states. Plenty of military or strategic targets can be struck to inflict severe damage, while avoiding excessive, if any, civilian casualties.

Two objections are frequently raised. First, the prospect of reprisals. Libya's Muammar Gaddafi, who clearly harbored the Palestinian terrorist Abu Nidal prior to his attacks on Americans and others in European airports last December, promised to retaliate if the U.S. took any action against him. He went so far as to promise to set the Mediterranean ablaze and even to precipitate global war. Such bluster should be viewed realistically. It emanates from fear. It also at times may be partly realized. We should recognize that a successful war on terrorists will involve a succession of blows and counterblows, and some unavoidable casualties along the way. What is required is a commitment to a continuous campaign against its sponsors, not just erratic responses to individual terrorist acts. There are no "one-shot" solutions. A forceful response against aggression may very well elicit reprisals initially. But over the long run, it is the only way to make governments stop launching terrorist killers. They need to know, they must know, that the West will not sit back and take it.

The second objection raised to military action against states sponsoring terrorism is that it will induce political consequences unfavorable to the West, such as the weakening or collapse of friendly regimes in the Middle East. Actually, these very regimes, despite their public pronouncements, would secretly welcome such action; after all, they too are frequently victims of the terrorist war. Still, what about unfavorable political developments? In many regions of the world, especially the Middle East, anger precedes respect. There may be a lashing out at Western or pro-Western targets following a military action, but there is a concomitant, if grudging, assessment by the terrorists of new limits. A posture of weakness, a repeated refusal to confront and punish the regimes behind the terrorists, not only invites further aggression but ultimately weakens the West's position, and consequently the position of its allies, in these regions and throughout the world.

Terrorists and the states that support them are serious adversaries. They are devious, ruthless and persistent. But the West has worsened the problem by its own disunity. For too long terrorists have succeeded in the strategy of divide and conquer. Governments have made separate deals with terrorists, allowing them, for example, freedom of movement in exchange for promises of immunity. But terrorists, who by their very nature ridicule the notion of law and treaties, always violate their agreements. The Western countries must face up to a simple truth: no deals are possible with terrorists. The success of terrorism in one part of the world encourages terrorists everywhere. Terrorism is an indivisible problem, and the fight against terrorism must be indivisible as well.

This means that you cannot "understand" terrorism when directed against someone else while opposing it when directed against yourself. Terrorism threatens the foundation of lawful and humane existence everywhere. And it thrives on weakness. It is naive to think that the I.R.A. does not take note of periodic British courting of the P.L.O. The same applies to the Red Brigades vis-a-vis the Italian government's dealings with Arab terrorists, and so on.

What is required is a basic realignment of international attitudes toward terrorism. While all governments offer rhetorical opposition to terrorism, including the adoption of a U.N. resolution condemning terrorism in 1985, in practice they fall into one of three categories: a few governments actually oppose terrorism, and do so consistently; others actively support terrorists; but most fall into a third broad category, the neutrals. They either acquiesce in terrorism or refuse to actively oppose it.

The measures against states that support terrorism are essential, but we must also do away with the middle ground of neutrality. Governments must be made to understand that if they acquiesce in terrorism, they are in practice supporting it. The provision of safe passage to foreign terrorists, such as Egypt offered to the hijackers of the Achille Lauro, should be considered an act of simple collusion. It is tantamount to offering a foreign army passage through your territory in time of war. Similarly, accepting a hijacked airplane or ship without accepting the concomitant responsibilities of preventing the escape of the terrorists is also an act of collusion; so is the refusal to extradite or punish terrorists.

The provision of sanctuary for terrorists is also an act of collusion. I am not talking about taking in war refugees who have laid down their arms (as France did after the Spanish Civil War). I am talking about permitting armed bands to wage terrorist war against a neighboring state from one's own territory. This is not one of the privileges of sovereignty. It is a clear act of aggression. It can and should be treated as such by the attacked state, which has every right to take action against the terrorists or the government that shelters them. It may do so either in hot pursuit, in retaliation or even in pre-emptive action. The right of self-defense takes precedence over sovereignty.

When a state deliberately employs terrorists, the distinction between striking back at the terrorists themselves or at the governments that shelter them is one of practical consideration, not of principle. There is certainly no moral imperative to confine the retaliation to the actual perpetrators; the terrorists, after all, are merely servants of the government. In war, limiting a counterattack to exactly those soldiers who fired at you would be absurd.

Lesser forms of tolerating terrorism, like lax security safeguards in airports, should be considered a tacit form of collusion with terrorists. It allows them to penetrate air routes and attack civilians from all countries. Offending governments should be told that their airports will be cut off from the international aviation system until they improve security.

The broad assortment of "neutral" states that repeatedly, or as a matter of policy, facilitate the operations of terrorists must be told that they risk being subjected to some or all of the sanctions that outright supporters of terrorists invite upon themselves.

A policy of firmness will make it clear that individual terrorists will be pursued, caught and punished; that the organizations that launch them will be subject to attack; that the governments that shelter them will face political, economic and, ultimately, military retaliation; that other governments that collude less brazenly will also be held accountable.

What, then, has inhibited the widespread adoption of this policy by the West? I believe it is the persistent effects of three vices. One is greed, or heedless promotion of economic self-interest, whatever the political or moral consequences. A second is political cowardice, which means sitting it out while your ally is attacked, or responds to an attack, so as not to invoke the wrath of the terrorists. Both factors played a part in the immediate rejection by several governments of the American initiative for sanctions against Libya following the attacks on the Rome and Vienna airports. Neither cowardice nor greed will easily disappear. If, however, the U.S. persists in its firm stance, I believe that it will eventually succeed in pressuring, even shaming, other Western states into compliance.

But there is a third, even more pernicious impediment that needs to be overcome: a confusion that is both moral and intellectual. We in the West believe in the capacity of politics to mitigate, and resolve, all conflict. We automatically tend to endow an adversary with the same assumptions. These could not be more misplaced than in the case of terrorists, who use political language to destroy the concept of politics altogether. And even when we catch a glimpse of this truth, we fail to grasp its essence. For the West is in awe of fanaticism. It is confused before a supposed willingness to die for a cause, believing that such readiness must be based on a cause that is at least partially just. Even a cursory reading of history tells us how dangerous a notion that is. No people were more prepared to sacrifice their lives for a cause than the Hitler Youth.

But our present notions of terrorism are informed not by history but in large measure by the media. This is why terrorists, in their war against the West, devote so much of their strategy and their effort to capturing the Western press and using it for their own purposes. But this need not succeed. Terrorism's reliance on the press and television of the democracies gives the media tremendous power not only to amplify terrorism's message but also to snuff it out. They can and should refuse to broadcast indiscriminately interviews with terrorists. They can and should expose their grisly acts for what they are.

What the public has a right to demand of journalists is the same scrupulousness and professionalism, no more and no less, that they would show in the case of covering organized crime and its bosses. The proven power of a thorough press investigation to expose and to repudiate such corruption—indeed, to galvanize public opposition against it—is exactly the power that can be harnessed against terrorism. A thoughtful press can turn terrorism's greatest weapon against the terrorists themselves.

This is the responsibility of the West's press. It is second only to the responsibility of its political leadership. For only a determined leadership can make the West overcome the impediments of greed, cowardice and moral confusion.

Which leadership? It can come only from the U.S., which alone has the capacity to align the West's resistance, alone can credibly threaten the offenders and alone can impel the neutrals to shed their neutrality. The U.S. appears to be moving in this direction, albeit sometimes at an uncertain pace. The more the U.S. resorts to action, like punishing terrorists and their backers, the greater the number of states that will join the American efforts to combat terrorism. Allies and adversaries alike, the entire world is waiting to see the depth of the American resolve.

The West can win the war against terrorism, and fairly rapidly. But it must first win the war against its own inner weakness. That will require courage. First, government leaders must have the political courage to present the truth, however unpleasant, to their people. They must be prepared to make difficult decisions, to take measures that may involve great risks, they may even end in failure and subject them to public criticism.

Second, the soldiers who may actually be called upon to combat terrorists will need to show military courage. It will be up to them to decide whether they can or cannot undertake a particular operation that a government is considering. In the special units of the Israeli army, for example, no one has ever simply been told by the political leadership that he must accept a perilous assignment. The commanders are always asked: Is it possible? Do you think you can do it? And if they ever said it could not be done, or even if they expressed doubts, that would have been the end of the matter.

But there is also a third kind of courage: the civic valor that must be shown by an entire people. All citizens in a democracy threatened by terrorism must see themselves, in a certain sense, as soldiers in a common battle. They must not pressure their government to capitulate or to surrender to terrorism. This is especially true of public pressure on government by families of hostages. Such pressure can only be called a dereliction of civic duty. If we seriously want to win the war against terrorism, we must be prepared to endure sacrifice and even, should there be the loss of loved ones, immeasurable pain.

Terrorism is a phenomenon that tries to evoke one feeling: fear. It is understandable that the one virtue most necessary to defeat terrorism is therefore the antithesis of fear: courage.

Courage, said the Romans, is not the only virtue, but it is the single virtue without which all the others are meaningless. The terrorist challenge must be answered. The choice is between a free society based on law and compassion and a rampant barbarism in the service of brute force and tyranny. Confusion and vacillation facilitated the rise of terrorism. Clarity and courage will ensure its defeat.●

NATIONAL MATHEMATICS AWARENESS WEEK

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, Congress has designated this week of April 14 to 20, 1986, as "National Mathematics Awareness Week." I strongly support this effort to increase public understanding and appreciation of the important role mathematics plays in our lives and which encourages our young people to develop skills in this area.

Without a strong mathematics foundation in the United States, we as a world leader suffer. Mathematics is essential for the economic security and defense of our country. Math skills are fundamental to all aspects of science, ranging from physics and chemistry to behavioral science. Our young scientists today will be developing the technological breakthroughs of tomorrow.

Recent findings have shown that American students are scoring lower in mathematics than those from a dozen other industrial nations. Enrollment in mathematics programs has been declining at all levels. In 1984 only 55 percent of mathematics doctoral graduates from U.S. institutions were U.S. citizens.

America must gain back its competitive edge. For several years we have confronted a severe trade crisis which presses the deficit upward. While the reasons for our decline in competitiveness are varied, part of the problem lies in the need to better educate our labor force in new technologies. Since the 1983 National Commission on Excellence in Education composed its report, "A Nation at Risk" there have been numerous studies that sadly display a declining trend in our Nation's academic performance.

We must take action now to help our children prepare for the job markets of the future. Our ability to maintain and improve our competitiveness in the world economy depends upon the strength of our training in increasingly technical areas requiring strong math skills.

"National Mathematics Awareness Week" must provide an impetus for further scholastic improvements in the field of mathematics and draw attention to the vital role this area of study plays in our country's future and well-being.●

THE BUDGET

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I ask that an interesting Wall Street Journal article about Congress appear in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Apr. 16, 1986]

DEMOCRATS ARE THE BUDGET CULPRITS

(By James L. Payne)

There's no doubt that a crime has been committed. We can all see the evidence: Federal spending has increased more than eightfold in the past 20 years, outstripping revenues and leaving us with a staggering deficit. The problem does not stem from increased defense spending. These outlays have increased only modestly overall (thus shrinking defense's share of the budget from about half to one-quarter). Skyrocketing domestic spending is the heart of the problem.

But who did it? Who is to blame for all this increased spending?

The popular view, echoed most recently by David Stockman, is that Republicans are about as much to blame as Democrats. Having spent four years trying to persuade fellow Republicans to vote against spending, Mr. Stockman concludes that "a large share of the problem is us."

The popular theory goes that each party has an ideological commitment to a particular segment of society. The Democrats favor the lower classes, and have therefore pushed for more spending in the welfare-related areas, while the Republicans, representing upper-income groups, have sought higher spending for business and wealthy interests. In this same theory, each party has tended to oppose the spending measures favoring the pet groups of the other. Hence, each party can claim an alibi when it comes to the deficit and point an accusing finger at the other.

Unlike a drawing-room mystery, the crime of runaway federal spending is easy to solve. An extensive public record exists in congressional votes on spending bills. These are the deeds that create the higher spending. By tabulating these votes, we can discover who is to blame.

In selecting spending bills for analysis, certain rules must be observed to avoid misleading results. One avoids using bills with other issues piggybacked on them—called "riders"—because the votes on these bills represent a confusing mixture of motivations. One also avoids using the final votes on spending measures (which embody prior compromises), votes on frivolous proposals, highly lopsided votes, votes with low attendance, and votes on parliamentary issues.

Working within these guidelines, I studied House of Representatives voting patterns on domestic spending during 1984—David Stockman's last full year as budget director. Twelve key votes were selected for analysts, with three votes each in the areas of welfare, agriculture, science and culture, and business.

VOTING ON DOMESTIC SPENDING MEASURES

[House of Representatives, 1984]

	Percentage voting for higher spending
	Democrat	Republican
Welfare measures:
Weatherization for low-income homeowners	53	13
Child nutrition	92	28
Grace Commission savings	76	22
Average	73.7	21
Agriculture measures:
Organic farming/crop rotation subsidies	81	10
Grace Commission savings	78	33

VOTING ON DOMESTIC SPENDING MEASURES—Continued

[House of Representatives, 1984]

	Percentage voting for higher spending
	Democrat	Republican
1 percent reduction in Department of Agriculture	58	15
Average	72.3	19.3
Science/culture measures:
Water resources research (veto override)	99	46
Funding for advanced computers	83	7
Public broadcasting	78	20
Average	86.7	24.3
Business/commercial measures:
Loans to "non-disadvantaged" businesses	99	56
Deauthorize Cross-Florida Barge Canal	60	35
Synthetic fuels spending	67	42
Average	75.3	44.3
Grand average, all 12 issues	77.0	27.2

Source: Congressional Quarterly Weekly Reports.

The accompanying table shows the results. Looking at the welfare spending votes first, the "ideological" theory seems to hold up. The Democrats are clearly for higher spending, while the Republicans are predominantly opposed. As we turn to agriculture, however, the ideological theory starts to look shaky, for the Democrats are pushing for higher spending in this area—most of which goes to wealthy farmers and agribusiness corporations.

In spending on science and culture we find the contradiction deepens. The Democrats are overwhelmingly in favor of higher spending, even though these funds go to well-heeled scientists, educators and administrators. One bill, for example, allocated $180 million to water research institutes in each of the 50 states. After taking their cut, the managers of these institutes would in turn spread the money around to university personnel. The Republicans differ from the Democrats even more sharply on these issues than on welfare spending.

The biggest surprise, however, comes when we look at the votes on pro-business spending. In direct contradiction to the ideological theory, it is the Democrats who are plunking for spending in this area. On the proposal to eliminate Small Business Administration direct loans, for example, the Democrats voted 242-2 against elimination (for higher spending). Exempted from this proposed elimination were minority, handicapped, and other "economically disadvantaged" groups. So the Democrats were lining up, almost unanimously, to save a federal program of loans to ordinary businessmen. The Florida Barge Canal was opposed not only by the economy-minded but by certain environmentalist groups; nevertheless, most Democrats, including scores of liberals, voted to retain the project. This vote typifies the recent voting pattern on public works: Democrats are almost always more in favor of these projects than are Republicans.

We have to conclude, then, that the ideological theory about federal domestic spending is way off the mark. It is not true that all congressmen are equally in favor of higher spending. The Republicans tend to oppose spending in all domestic categories, including pro-business spending. Tabulations done by the National Taxpayers Union further confirm that Democrats are bigger spenders than Republicans. In the House in 1984, the average Republican pro-savings score was 50% while the average Democratic score was 26%. Of the top 50 penny-pinching members, 49 were Republicans. All 50 of the worst spenders were Democrats. The NTU study, by the way, is based on all 207 House spending roll-call votes in 1984, and includes votes on Pentagon spending.

One might wonder whether my finding is the result of the particular votes selected. These votes were chosen, however, because they seemed most satisfactory for answering my question: Turnout was high, the spending issues was important and clearly drawn, the vote was close, and so on. But even when one goes beyond this collection of particularly suitable votes, the pattern does not change. Democrats are more in favor of higher spending—even on trivial issues that have no ideological or policy importance.

For example, one bill proposed that the 500th anniversary of the discovery of America be celebrated at federal expense through the creation of a $2 million commission whose 20 staffers (not likely to be drawn from the ranks of the poor) would labor for five years tooting the horn of Christopher Columbus. This measure was approved by 83% of the Democrats; only 44% of the Republicans voted for it.

Even the rhetoric reflects the gap between the parties. Consider the following statement made on the floor of the House in 1982. In contention was an item in the NASA budget, a $35 million add-on in the funds for aeronautical research. The speaker urged the increase on the ground that it "may be in some respects the life or death of companies like Boeing, United Technologies, Pratt & Whitney, Rockwell, General Dynamics. . . ." This defender of subsidies for the Fortune 500 was Democrat Dan Glickman of Kansas. His party followed his lead: 83% of the Democrats voted for the expenditure, vs. only 20% of the Republicans.

Is perhaps my analysis faulty because it is based on a special period when it was a Republican president who sought to restrain spending?

If we go back in time we find the same pattern. Although little noticed, it was Democrats, not Republicans, who provided the major support for the 1979 Chrysler loan guarantees—a bailout that favored not only the company's investors but also highly paid auto workers. In the House, 81% of the Democrats voted for the bailout, as opposed to only 41% of the Republicans; in the Senate, 71% of the Democrats supported it while only 31% of the Republicans did.

Another revealing vote occurred when the Carter administration attempted to kill some especially wasteful water projects in 1980. The array of political and ideological interests pressuring Democratic congressmen not to spend the money was unprecedented. President Carter was joined by Interior Secretary Cecil D. Andrus, Common Cause, Americans for Democratic Action and a bevy of environmental groups—including the Sierra Club and the National Wildlife Federation. Nevertheless, when the House vote was taken 71% of the Democrats voted for retaining the questionable projects. The Republicans, with many more members from Western, water-thirsty states, were slightly more willing to save money, even though it meant siding with President Carter and the ADA: 66% voted for the projects.

NOT A CLASSICAL DIVISION

A more contemporary example of this behavior can be found in the congressional vote on the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings budget-balancing measure. By protecting welfare spending from cuts and mandating dramatic reductions in defense spending, G-R-H's effort to trim the size of government was a pill specifically sugarcoated for liberals. Yet it was not Democrats but Republicans who swallowed it. In the House, only 48% of the Democrats voted for Gramm-Rudman, compared with 86% of the Republicans; in the Senate, the corresponding figures were 50% and 81%.

We do not have a classical left-right division in our politics, with one party generally representing the downtrodden and the other representing the well-to-do. The axis of division today is over the size of the state. Democrats in Congress favor a larger role for government in most things, from broadcasting to barge canals, from child nutrition to Christopher Columbus. Mr. Stockman may have been too close to see it, too frustrated by losing budget battles on the margin, but overall, his former GOP colleagues in Congress are less in favor of this trend, and tend to resist the growth of government across the board.●

NAUM AND INNA MEIMAN: THE RIGHT TO CHOOSE

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, we, as Americans, are able to choose where we wish to live. Many of us take this right for granted. Naum and Inna Meiman, a couple living in the Soviet Union, have been denied this right.

For over 10 years, the Meimans have been refused permission to emigrate. They are an elderly, ailing couple. They would like to spend their remaining time in Israel, but the Soviet Government continues to deny this right. The Meimans pose no threat to the Soviet Government, and should be allowed to choose their home.

I implore the officials in the Soviet Union to let the Meimans emigrate to Israel.●

THE BUDGET RESOLUTION

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I rise to speak in support of the immediate movement of the budget resolution to the floor of the Senate for debate and subsequent action. This resolution, which is the result of a strong bipartisan effort within the Budget Committee, provides a responsible base upon which a final budget can be constructed.

During the final days of the 1st session of the 99th Congress we passed the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 by an overwhelming margin in both Houses of Congress. By passing this legislation we were stating, out loud, that our previous methods of constructing a budget were not working. No one really disagreed with this since the evidence was clear: runaway deficits, a Federal debt that exceeded $2 trillion and had doubled over the past 5 years, and debt service payments that were consuming almost 15 percent of our total outlays. We were moving in the wrong direction and very rapidly. By passing this legislation we were also stating that we had a new and better method constructing the budget, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

Gramm-Rudman-Hollings set forth a series of requirements in order to accomplish our objective of reversing the negative effects of prior budget decisions. In addition to mandating maximum deficit levels and an across-the-board sequestering mechanism, the act established a timetable to provide for the orderly and comprehensive consideration of budget issues. April 15 was designated as the deadline for passage of the budget resolution by both the Senate and the House of Representatives. This date has passed and the resolution has not been brought to the floor of the Senate even though the committee completed its work and reported out a budget resolution over a month ago. Our vote for Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and its requirements represented a commitment to the American people that we would deal with the budget in a different and more responsible manner. By not acting within the established timetable, we are reneging on that commitment.

I have heard that some of my colleagues in the Senate are not satisfied with this resolution and this has caused the delay. If this is true, I suggest that those Members should propose to change it by offering amendments during the 50 hours scheduled on this issue. I look forward to the opportunity to make these hard choices and I plan to play an active role during this time since I believe that certain changes are necessary.

Mr. President, today in his opening statement the distinguished minority leader commented on the Senate's delay in its consideration of this matter. He stated, "While nothing happens, something bad happens." Senator BYRD was correct in his assessment of the effect of delaying action on this crucial issue. We are at a critical point in the development and implementation of a responsible system of determining the Federal budget. It is irresponsible on our part to continue to delay action on the resolution when we agreed to follow a designated timetable for its consideration.

Our constituents have elected us to generate, and hopefully abide by, responsible legislation, not to avoid making difficult decisions. Consequently, I ask that the budget resolution be brought to the floor as expeditiously as possible for our consideration.●

TRANSITION TO DEMOCRACY IN THE PHILIPPINES

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, the recent peaceful transfer of power in the Philippines is an event which Americans can reflect on with pride. With the support of a unified U.S. Government and citizenry, the Philippine people have made a strong and very effective statement about the value of democracy.

And, yet, the new opportunities now available to Filipino people are tempered by the realities of a country which has suffered too long under economic, social, and political neglect. Americans, with their short attention spans on matters of this complexity, must realize that the long struggle toward economic prosperity and political and social justice for all Philippine people has just begun.

Through this struggle, it will be important for the United States to continue to play a supportive and positive role. And it will remain essential that Americans continue to be exposed to the evolution of change, and difficult challenges, facing this valued U.S. ally.

Because of the important record that it provides of the continuing struggle for economic and social justice at this time in the Philippines, I ask that the following two-part series of articles by Frank Wright, foreign correspondent for the Minneapolis Star and Tribune, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The articles referred to follow:

EXPECTATIONS RUN HIGH AS AQUINO DEALS WITH THE RICH AND THE POOR

(By Frank Wright)

MANILA, PHILIPPINES.—Serapio Gabriel and Emil Ong were in the streets as part of the Manila people power that helped lift Corazon Aquino to the presidency of the Philippines.

Now they are part of the revamped—but once again elite—establishment that is helping her run the country, Gabriel as an influential businessman and Ong as a ranking government official.

Many others, most of them poor and oppressed, did not celebrate in the streets of Manilia. Fisherman Boy Cuenco, farmer Warlito Gadia, street vendor and mother Juliette Miguel, factory worker Naz Espiriau and 2-year-old Rodolfo Sarsaba are not part of the new establishment.

The challenge for Aquino is how well, and how soon, she can bring them all together, the rich who once again are in control and the poor who once again are not.

A sharp look at the Philippines and the feelings expressed by its people reveals expectations are high:

Economically, a hunger to close the gap between the fewer than 20 percent of the people who receive more than half the income and the 70 percent who live in poverty.

Politically, a growing demand by the underclasses for a share of the government power that always has been reserved for their alleged betters.

Socially, a strong desire for more independence, personally in terms of human rights guarantees and nationally in terms of freedom from overseas influence.

A thoughtful look at the Philippines also raises the questions of what the United States learned from the recent Philippine experience, and of how the United States, which has been the dominant foreign influence in the islands for practically all of this century, will continue its major presence.

By most standards Aquino has made a promising start toward cleaning up the mess left by Ferdinand Marcos, her deposed predecessor.

She has consolidated her power by deft selection of coalition Cabinet ministers; kept the Marcos faction at bay by disbanding the Marcos-controlled National Assembly until a new constitution is implemented and elections held; put the government bureaucracy on notice that corruption no longer will be tolerated; won early tests to bring the military under her civilian control, and at least temporarily blunted the Communist-led insurgency by releasing several of its former leaders and hundreds of other political prisoners.

But in the long run she will be measured by how well she does in solving the basic economic, political and social problems that existed under Marcos and that still exist today.

It will be a difficult task because the leaders, including Aquino, may well not want to go as far as the people want to go.

Aquino is just beginning. If she succeeds in bringing the establishment and the rest of the country together, a truly unified Philippines may emerge. If she doesn't, signs point to renewed unrest.

The new leadership, while avoiding overoptimism, sees a glimmering future.

Gabriel, executive vice president of Philippine Commercial Credit Card, Inc., the biggest plastic money company in the islands, opposed Marcos for a long time. He had said he considered Marcos a crook and despot who was destroying the economy and the country. Gabriel supported Aquino and protected the ballot boxes as a poll watcher on election day.

When the final uprising started Feb. 22, he said, "I got all the kids together and took them out there to see history in the making. Suddenly, you were proud to be a Filipino again."

As a former president of Manila Rotary, a potent organization in the Philippines, and as a prominent corporation executive, Gabriel will be influential in winning support from the business community.

The problems are complex, and solutions will take time, he said. But, he added, business confidence has been restored, prospects are good and "the people will be patient."

Ong, who managed Aquino's campaign on the islands of Leyte and Samar, also was in the Manila crowd during that climactic weekend. He said he spent three nights outside gate 4 at Camp Aguinaldo, one of the two camps where the military defectors barricaded themselves.

"It was really something to see the people protecting (them)," he said. "The people were crying. The soldiers inside the gate were crying. It was really a miracle."

Now Ong, an attorney and senior member of the family's farming and building supply businesses, is a deputy minister of agriculture. He also has been appointed administrator of the National Food Authority.

His primary tasks are to stabilize prices of cereal grains, particularly rice and sweet corn, and equalize their distribution throughout the islands.

His biggest shock, he said, was discovering that his agency's treasury is virtually bare, allegedly stripped by Marcos to help pay for his reelection campaign. That could cause serious difficulties, Ong said, because Filipino farmers depend on his agency to buy portions of their crops. He said the government may need additional short-term assistance from lenders such as the International Monetary Fund.

He said he has requested an audit and will tour agency facilities, which include more than 300 offices and warehouses across the country, to assure farmers that the government wants to do well by them. "We need to reach out," he said.

Reaching out will not be simple. Government television recently reported that 23 people were killed in a rebel attack on one of the warehouses in Allacapan, about 250 miles north of Manila. The report said 15 of the dead were guerillas. It was the bloodiest insurgent raid since Aquino took office.

To the Cuencos and others among the poor, most of whom live in the provinces, government changes in Manila can seem far away and of little immediate effect.

Rural and small town people, who comprise almost three-fourths of the population, often are victims of long-standing conditions they did not create, and they are skeptical about improvement even when proposed by people of good will.

Cuenco, 28, an unemployed fisherman in Bula with a wife and two children, remains blacklisted as a troublemaker. He said he was fired last year when he refused his employer's order to charge a fishing crew rent for equipment they had not used.

He and his family live in a shack in a squatters' village next to the shore in southern Mindanao, surviving mostly on rare odd jobs and donations from friends.

"It is hard," he said. "We eat much salted fish. We do not often have delicious food."

Gadia, 24, a farmer driven off his land by fighting between the government and the rebels, still lives in the mud and slop of Alegria Evacuation Center, his family and two others crowded into the same house. About 1,000 families live at the center, a sorry collection of temporary huts near the Mindanao village of Alabel.

Most have come since November, after being ordered from their farms by government soldiers who designated vast areas in the hills as official no-man's lands in order to clear them of suspected rebel supporters.

The farmers now must walk to their farms each day, a trek of two hours each way for some. Time in the fields is shortened because farmers can be out only in daylight lest they be shot as curfew violators and suspected rebels. And they are required to work alone. Crops suffer accordingly. Farmers also sometimes discover that their chickens and hogs have been "liberated" by armed fighters on one side or the other.

Gadia said he came to the center "for the security of my family" after his village suffered two massacres. The residents, he said, "say it was the Marcos military. The military says it was the rebels."

Even at the center, he said, "it is not really safe." Squads of local militia from the Civilian Home Defense Force "prowl at night," Gadia said, and the New Peoples' Army, the Communist-led rebels, once sent in a hit team that shot and killed a "notorious person" suspected of being a government informer.

In addition to security problems, he said, illness is common, health care is virtually nonexistent and the number of children in school is dwindling because fewer parents can afford books and supplies.

Gadia said he had little faith that a change in government will help him, and he has "no idea" when conditions will allow his family to return home.

The nightmares have gone away for Miguel, 45, a mother of nine who was arrested and tortured for three days and nights in 1983 by authorities seeking information about the rebels in central Luzon.

But she still suffers harsh headaches and recurring pain in her neck and shoulders from the blows.

And she has not forgotten, she says, how the military men beat her breasts, battered her knees with rifle butts and three times pointed a gun at her heart and pulled the trigger trying to frighten her into talking.

Or how they strung up her husband with his belt until his tongue hung out and he gasped for air. Because of the torture, Miguel said, he no longer is able to farm. The best he can get is occasional work on a fishing boat.

Espiriau, in his 20s, a factory worker fired for union activities, still lives in Mariveles on the Bataan peninsula, near a memorial garden that marks the starting point of the World War II Death March.

He continues trying to organize fellow workers, three-fourths of them young women in a huge industrial complex where most earn less than the government says they need to feed their families and where employment has dropped 50 percent.

Sarsaba, according to the New York Times, died of malnutrition three weeks ago in the hospital in Bacolod on the island of Negros at the age of 2.

She was the fouth child to die from malnutrition in three weeks in her neighborhood of 350 people. Two others were in the hospital and 23 more were identified by health workers as substantially deficient.

Sometimes as many as 10 children a day die at the hospital for lack of food, doctors said.

Close to 80 percent of school age Filipino children are considered undernourished in a country that has ranked among the top 20 food producing nations in the world.

The important thing to keep in mind about the Philippines is that the real revolution, if there is one, is yet to come.

Getting rid of Marcos was only the first step—and perhaps the easiest—in the transition to the future.

As Aquino and her new government look ahead, they face more questions than answers.

Does she have the will and the vision necessary to reshape the country's foundations, or will she prefer to revise around the margins and retain much of the semi-feudal society that has so bountifully benefitted her family and others among the rich for so long?

If she chooses to make major changes, does she have the skill, perseverance and political support required to succeed?

How long will the people wait before they turn again to the streets in renewed protest over the condition of their lives or turn to the violent solutions offered by the rebel army and the Communists?

The United States also has some sorting out to do:

How much was the U.S. government a part of the problem in the Philippines, which it colonized for the first 40 years of the century and where it either stood by or assisted indirectly as Marcos spent most of the past 20 years ruling and abusing the people with authoritarian power, robbing the economy of estimated billions and helping run what remained into the ground?

What does an analysis of the past say about future military and economic assistance to the Aquino administration, U.S. attitudes toward the large American military bases in the Philippines and other bilateral issues?

What new guidelines for U.S. relations with other developing nations can be drawn from the Philippines, where the United States stayed with a fading ruler unwilling to change and abandoned him only as his own people were pushing him out the door?

The discussion is just starting.

POLICY LESSONS FOR UNITED STATES REMAIN UNCLEAR

(By Frank Wright)

The Philippine episode has reopened an old debate about U.S. foreign policy.

The issue can be put simply: How and when should the United States, as a democratic world power, intervene in the affairs of smaller and less powerful nations, especially those ruled by despots?

Numerous scholars, policymakers, would-be policymakers and advocates with and without portfolio are searching for the broad lessons of those emotional days in which the people of the Philippines, with some help from their church, military defectors and a U.S. president who stayed out of the way, dumped President Ferdinand Marcos and replaced him with Carazon Aquino.

But examination of the post-up-heaval rhetoric makes it clear there is little consensus on what is to be learned from the experience and how it can be applied to other situations.

One sentiment that does come through is that the United States should be more alert to spotting moderate opposition in such countries and more eager to provide early encouragement in the interests of spreading freedom and deterring dictatorships of whatever stripe.

To some extent, that is the message behind President Reagan's post-Haiti and Post-Philippine declaration that the United States henceforth will oppose tyrants of the political right as well as those of the left. Reagan's previous orientation was to destabilize governments on the left while supporting those on the right in the interests of anti-Communism.

Beyond that, however, divergence reigns about the lessons from the Philippines. Some analysts and activists, usually those toward one end of the political spectrum or the other, say it would be good for the sake of consistency to take a single approach to all situations. They seem inclined toward more intervention in despotic countries rather than less.

Others, usually in the middle, are more cautious about interventionist solutions and say the best that can be hoped for is to understand our own interests and to be pragmatic, innovative and knowledgeable about the details of every situation because each will be different.

One of the few underlying themes in the discussion is that the future will be increasingly complicated because the United States probably is going to face the intervention issue with increasing frequency if only because the Third World—and its myriad countries struggling under various forms of government—is forcing its way more and more into the American consciousness.

Individually, these countries become centers of extraordinary attention and significance whenever the United States or the Soviet Union, or both, turn one of them into an East-West battle ground—politically, militarily or economically. As in Angola. Or Nicaragua.

Collectively, they also are hard to ignore, as in the often anti-U.S. majority their growing number sometimes creates at the United Nations.

Lack of consensus about what has happened in the past, in this case in the Philippines, contributes to the lack of consensus about a future course. One's perception of that history depends in part on one's vantage point.

The prevailing American view of the U.S. presence in the Philippines for most of this century is that it was very much a good thing for the Philippines. Emphasis in this version is on a strong education system and high literacy levels, improved health care, the introduction of democratic governmental institutions, economic cooperation and a people-to-people friendship that saw Americans and Filipinos fight side-by-side against the Japanese invaders in World War II and that since has seen about 2 million Filipinos emigrate to the United States.

But there are many Filipinos and some Americans who hold a different view. They accuse the United States of suffering from historical amnesia, contending that most history of the Philippines is written by Americans from a Western view and that it plays down the negative aspects of the U.S. role.

For example, American students often are taught little about the U.S. acquisition of the Philippines other than that the country was ceded to the United States as a result of the U.S. victory in the Spanish-American War. Spain had colonized the Philippines in the 16th century.

All but overlooked is the fact that the United States at the time refused to recognize a Filipino rebellion that virtually had driven the Spaniards out. Instead, the United States spent four years conquering the Philippines. The war killed tens of thousands of U.S. soldiers, killed many times more Filipinos and prompted a Vietnam-like protest in the United States led by the likes of William Jennings Bryan. This view of the history sees the Spanish-American influence as robbing the Filipinos of their Asian heritage and identity and forcing them into a dependency that has left them poor economically and otherwise.

A similar difference in vantage point seems to contribute to the varying views of just who was responsible for what in the recent overthrow.

Reagan, official Washington and journalists in Washington tend to give the United States more credit for engineering Marcos' downfall than it gets from people in the Philippines, including foreign journalists and other foreign observers.

Washington contends that Marcos, in the early days of his 20-year regime, was well-liked by the people and was something of a reformer, remained popular for a time even after declaring martial law in 1972 and had lost support only in the past few years, at which point the United States pressured him to reform and, finally, turned its back on him when he refused.

Many Filipinos and some U.S. experts acknowledge Marcos' early popularity but argue that the United States, by continuing its economic, military and psychological support for Marcos for years after he declared martial law, contributed to the subjugation of the Philippine people, failed to encourage the moderate opposition at crucial early moments and stood by the despot far too long.

Those who hold this view give virtually all of the credit for the overthrow to the throngs that faced down divided and shaky military forces when Marcos ordered them to attack, an event that has to be one of the greatest victories in history for nonviolence. Some credit, especially for critical timing, is given to the military leaders who defected. Some is given to the Roman Catholic church hierarchy for its support of Aquino as the crisis approached. Little credit is given to the United States.

Those who minimize Reagan's role in deposing Marcos tend to doubt his enthusiasm for rocking right-wing boats in the future. They describe his declaration as simply an opportunistic political move to attract support from congressional liberals for his proposal to send $100 million in new aid to the anti-Sandinista rebels in Nicaragua.

Reagan spokesmen acknowledge a certain political motive, but they also say the declaration is sincere.

A key test will come in South Korea, a long-time and heavily supported U.S. ally in Asia run in autocratic fashion similar to the Marcos Philippines. The military has even greater control of the society in South Korea.

Human rights groups have registered protests. A newly developing political opposition that professes to seek greater democracy is taking heart from the Marcos-Aquino episode. The Catholic hierarchy is beginning to speak up. The South Korean government, apparently nervous about what happened in the Philippines, has loosened slightly its restrictions on dissidents.

For some time the United States has been prodding here and there for more democracy but has been unwilling to take drastic actions that might seriously erode the anti-Communist regime of President Chun Doo Hwan.

Elections are scheduled for early 1988.●

DR. JAMES I. McCORD

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to offer my congratulations to Dr. James I. McCord, who was recently awarded the prestigious Templeton Prize for Progress in Religion for his work as an educator. The prize carries with it a cash award of $250,000, which Dr. McCord has announced will substantially be used to endow the Center of Theological Inquiry at Princeton.

Dr. McCord, who served as president of the Princeton Theological Seminary in New Jersey from 1959–82, is now the chancellor of the Center of Theological Inquiry, a religious advanced research center modeled after Princeton's Institute for Advanced Studies. The center, founded by Dr. McCord in 1982, offers scholars an opportunity to do theological research on a full-time basis.

Dr. McCord has also devoted part of his career toward finding agreement among different religious denominations. He has headed the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the Consultation on Church Union, whose goal was to merge 10 Protestant denominations.

The award will be presented formally to Dr. McCord on May 13 by Princess Alexandra of Great Britain. The award has been presented to 13 recipients in the past, including Mother Teresa, Reverend Billy Graham, and Alexander Solzhenitsyn.

I extend my very best wishes to Dr. McCord on this special occasion and wish him much continued success in the future. His efforts to establish a dialogue between scientists and theologians is particularly timely.●

ORDERS FOR FRIDAY

RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 11 a.m. on Friday, April 18, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there be special orders in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 5 minutes each:

Senators HAWKINS, PROXMIRE, CRANSTON, and DURENBERGER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, following the special orders just identified, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 12 noon, with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, at 12 noon, the Senate may be asked to turn to the consideration of any of the following items:

S. 49, the gun control bill; Senate Concurrent Resolution 120, the budget resolution; the motion to proceed to S. 1848, the drug export bill; and the executive nomination of Donald M. Newman, and possibly the daylight savings time amendment to the fire protection bill, S. 2180.

The RECORD is already clear: there will be no votes tomorrow. If anything is brought up it will be for debate only.

I would not expect we would be in session very long tomorrow.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if I may, if the majority leader will yield, is the distinguished majority leader in a position to say what the Senate might expect or what our colleagues might expect with respect to rollcall votes on Monday?

Mr. DOLE. I think they can expect, in fact, there will be no rollcall votes on Monday. Again, if it is the budget we are on, we will have a lot of debate up front. If it is the gun control bill we are on, I understand we will have a lot of debate up front. I think I indicated earlier to the distinguished minority leader that there would be no votes on Monday.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 11 a.m. on Friday, April 18, 1986.

The motion was agreed to; and, at 6:46 p.m., the Senate recessed until Friday, April 18, 1986, at 11 a.m.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate April 17, 1986:

INTER-AMERICAN FOUNDATION

Richard Thomas McCormack, of Pennsylvania, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Inter-American Foundation for the remainder of the term expiring September 20, 1988.

The above nomination was approved subject to the nominee's commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

ADDITION OF THE KINGS RIVER TO THE NATIONAL WILD AND SCENIC RIVER SYSTEM

HON. RICHARD H. LEHMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to add 92.5 miles of the Kings River to the National Wild and Scenic River System. Named the "Holy River of Kings" by early explorers, the Kings River continues to live up to its name beginning at its headwaters in Kings Canyon National Park and flowing unimpeded to Pine Flat Reservoir in Fresno County, CA. The Kings River today is still a majestic Sierra Nevada waterway. In the spring, the canyon slopes are blanketed with purple wildflowers, and against this backdrop the Kings River sweeps down through the Sierra. The Kings River, however, is in danger of losing its natural character unless Congress adds it to the National Wild and Scenic River System.

The river is threatened with a dam at Rodgers Crossing above Pine Flat Reservoir If the Kings River is dammed at this point, from 9 to 13 miles of the main fork of the river will be inundated destroying its scenic beauty, diminishing its natural wildlife and devastating its current recreational uses for wild trout fishing, whitewater rafting, and camping. For me, protecting the Kings River is a personal commitment. I have simply walked alongside the Kings for too many years to let her go without a fight—I know her splendor firsthand—the rough and the smooth places alike.

Portions of this mighty river have already been recognized for their special characteristics. The California Department of Fish and Game designated the main and the South Forks of the Kings River as wild trout streams. A designated national recreation trail runs along the Kings from Garnet Dike to Spring Creek, and Kings Canyon National Park takes its name from the river. The California Wilderness Act of 1984 placed the land alongside the Kings River from the confluence of the Middle and South Fork Kings into wilderness and land on both sides of the main fork of the Kings River is being studied for wilderness designation.

In 1985, the Sequoia National Forest as part of its land and resource management plan found that the South Fork of the Kings River was suitable for status as wild in some segments and recreational in other portions. The Sequoia plan then looked at 18 miles of the main fork of the Kings and determined that 5 miles could be classified as wild. On the 13 miles of the Kings directly above Pine Flat Reservoir, the Forest Service simply declined to take a position. The Forest Service did not find this portion of the Kings unsuitable for national designation by virtue of natural characteristrics; rather, it deferred its professional judgment until economic and political decisions are made about the Rodgers Crossing Dam.

The Kings River Conservation District [KRCD] is the primary proponent of a hydroelectric project at Rodgers Crossing and is a group I have great respect for in its sincere and legitimate efforts to secure additional water for agriculture. Currently, a 300,000 acre-feet overdraft exists in the Kings River service area. I agree with KRCD on the problem; I disagree with KRCD only with regard to the solution. If built at its most economical height of 420 feet, the Rodgers Crossing Dam would generate only about 33,000 acre-feet of yield for irrigation. Rodgers Crossing is a hydroelctric generating facility, not a water project. This project was studied in 1972 by the Army Corps of Engineers and determined unsuitable for Federal development because of a negative benefit-cost ratio. Although it can be argued that a more favorable benefit-cost ratio could occur with declining interest rates and more emphasis on electric generation over irrigation, it is also true that the falling prices of oil in today's market act as a counterbalance to decrease the benefit-to-cost ratio.

There are alternatives for water development for the Kings River Conservation District, and I stand ready to work with KRCD to support other options. I have already introduced H.R. 3182 which would authorize the Mid-Valley Canal System to deliver approximately 650,000 acre-feet of additional surface water to the Central San Joaquin Valley. In addition, I am willing to take a hard look at whatever legislation would be necessary to authorize the raising of the existing Pine Flat Dam.

As a longtime proponent of numerous California water projects from New Melones to Auburn Dam, I firmly believe the Kings River provides us with an opportunity to both protect the river and allow new water development. Alternative water development projects are far preferable to damming the Kings River above the Pine Flat Reservoir.

The Kings River stands on its own merits as deserving Federal protection, and I urge my colleagues to join with me in designating the main fork of the Kings River above Pine Flat Reservoir, the Middle Fork and the South Fork of the Kings as part of the national wild and scenic river system.

BREWERY WORKERS WEEK

HON. JIM MOODY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, this year, the Brewery Workers Union Local 9 U.A.W. in Milwaukee is celebrating its 100th year of service to the workers and families in our community. The week of April 20 through April 26 has been designated "Brewery Workers Week" in Wisconsin.

Today, I would liked my colleagues to join me in extending our own congratulations to local 9 and its 5,000 active and retired members in this special centennial year.

Although there had been sporadic efforts to organize brewery workers in the 1850's, the first genuine brewery union was founded in Cincinnati in 1879. It, and a similar New York City union formed in 1881, however, were shortlived.

The organization that would come to represent workers in the brewing industry was founded at a Baltimore convention in 1886. Originally called the Brewery Workers National Union, it grew to more than 4,000 members during its first 4 months. On March 4, 1887, an American Federation of Labor charter authorized the new group to "proceed with the organization of the trade."

Over the last century, local 9 has grown larger and stronger. It has always been an effective and important voice for its members. Today, under the leadership of President Ted Witkowski, local 9 members can be proud of their record of service to the brewing industry, to the Milwaukee community, and to the Nation. They have given the city and its people a strong sense of pride.

Because of local 9, Milwaukee and fine beer are synonymous in the minds of all Americans. Today, I am pleased to salute the brewery workers who've made Milwaukee famous.

BOMBING LIBYA WON'T STOP TERRORISM

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, Monday's military strike against Libya may have provided emotional satisfaction for those who felt it was time for the United States to retaliate against the wave of terrorism that has occurred over the past few years. But retaliation is not a policy against terrorism. This attack against Libya will not end terrorism; it will not even diminish it. Indeed, I think we all sense that terrorist incidents are likely to increase during the weeks and months ahead and, indeed, we already have evidence of that increase. The military strike showed the Libyans that the United States could respond to violence with violence, but where will this process take us? Where will the spiral end? It will not end, in my view, unless the United States pursues a policy aimed at the roots of terrorism.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.
Matter set in this typeface indicates words inserted or appended, rather than spoken, by a Member of the House on the floor.

I am convinced that our only viable long-term policy to combat terrorism is one that involves diplomatic—and not military—actions. Specifically, I feel we must strike at the root causes of terrorism in the Middle East by redoubling our efforts aimed at reaching a just and lasting settlement between Israel and the Arab nations. Only when such a peace accord is reached will we begin to gain the relief from terrorism that we so desire.

We are mistaken if we think that a single bombing raid on Libya will have a deterrent effect on terrorists. We can already see that radical Palestinian groups throughout the Middle East have been called to arms by our action. We know that Libya's terrorist activites increased after the Gulf of Sidra enagements in late March, and administration officials have already confirmed that Libya is stepping up its planning for attacks in the Middle East and Europe. This morning alone, we have heard of a bombing attempt at Heathrow Airport and the killing of three British citizens in the hills of Lebanon.

In his defense of the Libyan strike, the President said, "We have done what we had to do. If necessary, we shall do it again." Do we really mean this? Are we ready to commit ourselves to repeated bombings? Future retaliatory strikes are likely to be far more difficult and more likely to result in civilian casualties.

This week's attack was against easy targets. Our intelligence services were fortunate to intercept communications between Tripoli and the Libyan People's Bureau in East Berlin, enabling the administration to implicate Qadhafi in the recent nightclub bombing there. A similar mistake by terrorists is unlikely to be repeated. Of greater concern, however, is the likelihood that terrorists will now move their headquarters and training bases closer to populated regions, thus increasing the prospects of heavy civilian casualties in the event of retaliation. If this occurs, how many civilian lives will we be willing to take in connection with our military strikes?

The administration's attitude throughout this episode has been that Qadhafi is the root cause of terrorism in the world. The impression that has been created is that the removal of Qadhafi would bring about an end to terrorist attacks against Americans abroad. This is simply not true. Qadhafi happens to be a convenient target for our outrage, since he is such a brazen supporter of attacks against the United States; but major hotbeds of terrorism exist far beyond Libya's borders. Syria and Iran, for instance, have been actively involved in funding, training and promoting terrorism. If Qadhafi were removed and terrorism continued none the less, would the United States proceed with attacks against President Assad of Syria, the Soviet Union's principal ally in the region, or Ayatollah Khomeini, backed by Islamic fundamentalists ready and willing to become martyrs in the name of their religious fervor and allegiance to their leader?

Having unleashed violence as a means of dealing with terrorism, it may become difficult to turn this violence off. One need only look at the ongoing war between Israel and the Arab World—principally the Palestinian Liberation Organization [PLO] and other Palestinian factions—to see how entrenched the cycle of retaliation can become.

Israelis and Palestinians exchange military reprisals on a continual basis, at a rate difficult to even document. Daily incursions occur of Palestinians into Israeli-occupied territory. There have been bus bombings, air raids, kidnappings and five full-scale wars between Israel and its Arab neighbors over the past four decades, yet none of these actions have brought these parties any closer to a resolution of their conflict. On the contrary, each bombing against the other, each raid resulting in civilian casualties, each and every act of retaliation becomes justified as a response to the previous attack.

The administration has declared that its raid on Libya was an unqualified success. But what standard is appropriate for such a determination? If it is simply that the targets were destroyed, then I am sure that both the PLO and the Israelis have had dozens, perhaps hundreds of such successes. But the outcome has simply been a growing interchange of increasingly violent acts of vengeance. And now the United States, and Britain, have become active participants in this battle.

Many Americans seem to have no idea why the United States has become a target for terrorism. They simply do not realize that the primary target for a large portion of Middle East terrorism is Israel, with the United States being a secondary and sometimes only incidental target because of America's heavy financial and political support for Israel.

Recall that the Rome and Vienna airport bombings occurred simultaneously at the Israeli Airline [El Al] ticket counters. The Achille Lauro hijacking was perpetrated by a radical Palestinian group demanding the release of 50 Palestinians held in Israeli jails. This morning, a bomb was intercepted at the El Al ticket counters at Heathrow Airport in Britain. While 23 Americans lost their lives as the result of terrorist incidents overseas last year, the Israelis suffered far greater casualties. Of course, Israel considers itself in a state of war against terrorist attacks. The United States, however, could soon be a party to this war if our military actions continue to escalate.

Despite our preoccupation with Libyan-backed terrorist activity, the real wellspring of terrorism in the Middle East can be found in the Palestinian refugee camps of Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Nearly 2 million Palestinians reside in these camps in conditions of poverty, despair, and burning resentment against Israel. The only life that many of these Palestinians have ever known has been one of isolation, frustration, and a sense of abandonment. The refugee camps offer no prospect of liberation, except through enlistment in the terrorist ranks that are training themselves to attack Israel and its principal ally, the United States.

As long as the Palestinian refugee camps provide fertile ground for breeding terrorists, attacks against Americans and America will continue. Removing Qadhafi will not diminish the emnity held by Palestinians toward the Israelis, and destroying the refugee camps is obviously out of the question. We are left with little choice but to focus on a resolution of the Palestinian-Israeli problem. In this regard, the attack on Libya was counterproductive.

The Unified Arab condemnation for our strike this week demonstrated that attacks against Libya are viewed by the Arabs as attacks against all Moslems and the Islamic world as a whole. The moderate Arab nations have been forced to distance themselves from the Reagan administration, and the more radical Arab factions have rallied in opposition to the United States. This is not a constructive development in the context of reaching a Middle East peace accord; further American strikes will only make matters worse.

If our objective is to reduce terrorism emanating from the Middle East, and I trust this is our goal, then it is vital that the United States maintain its influence in the region. Military strikes will only further destabilize the area and make it more difficult for moderate Arab nations to participate in the peace process in cooperation with the United States.

The strike against Libya was an expression of rage, it was a statement of revenge. I hope we have now gotten that out of our system and are ready to resume the dialogue aimed at a peaceful settlement of some of the problems which lie at the root of terrorism. This will not be easy; diplomacy is never as easy as military actions. But we are fooling ourselves if we think continued escalation of the violence will make us safer from terrorist attacks.

I urge my colleagues to call for a resumption of the Middle East peace process and dedicate themselves to this vital approach to reducing terrorism.

IMPORTANCE OF MATHEMATICS RESEARCH

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, Congress has sent to President Reagan House Joint Resolution 519, a bill designating the current week as National Mathematics Awareness Week. As an original cosponsor of this measure and as chairman of the Science Research and Technology Subcommittee, I would like to comment on the importance of mathematics research.

Each field of science is in a continual state of expansion, as our innate curiosity and the demands of technology push foward the frontiers of knowledge. The process of creating or discovering the new ideas and methods is called research. Scientific research is vital to our Nation's progress. This is especially so of mathematics research, because mathematics is a foundation discipline, on which progress in all the other technical disciplines depends.

The Federal Government contributes to the support of basic scientific research for the simple reason that our continued well-being depends on it and other sectors of society cannot fully support the most fundamental parts of research—those with long-term payoffs. Our Government spends about $6.5 billion annually for basic scientific research. The total Federal expenditure on basic mathematics research is about $100 million annually, less than 1.5 percent of our basic research investment.

In 1984, the National Research Council published a report, "Renewing U.S. Mathematics: Critical Resource for the Future" presenting the findings of a panel of distinguished scientists and engineers chaired by Dr. Edward E. David, Jr., former Science Adviser to the President and former president of Exxon research and engineering. The major conclusions of their 3-year study were as follows:

Federal support for mathematics research is, indeed, out of balance with support for related fields of science and engineerng.

Over the 1968–82, span constant dollar support for mathematics has declined by 33 percent.

In the same time period, the field has doubled in size, as have most fields of science.

An additional investment of at least $100 million annually is needed bring things back into balance and provide for the future health of the field, the group recommended.

The National Science Foundation has begun an effort to restore balance; that is, to ensure that sufficient resources are provided to allow mathematics to develop at a pace commensurate with the other branches of science and engineering, which depend so heavily on mathematics.

All concerned should work to assure that the imbalance in allocation for basic mathematics research is not allowed to futher deteriorate.

RODINO OPPOSES AID TO CONTRAS

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am strongly opposed to the President's request for $100 million for the Contras who seek to overthrow the Sandinista government in Nicaragua. This is a huge, nearly fourfold increase in funding for the Contras since the first request 5 years ago for $19 million. If this request is granted, it will surely not be the last. It will be a downpayment of hundreds on millions more.

There is no doubt that the Sandinista government is repressive and has a dismal record of human rights violations, and I certainly do not want continuation and strengthening of a Marxist-Leninist regime in Central America But the Contras have also committed brutal atrocities and do not represent a viable or acceptable alternative to the Sandinistas. Just yesterday we saw reports on dissension among the top civilian leaders of the Contras amid charges of mishandling of funds, criminal activity, and human rights abuses. They do not inspire a popular, democratic movement inside Nicaragua but instead spread terror and hatred among the innocent campesinos.

I firmly believe that the only effective and realistic solution is through negotiation. Despite the recent setback, the Contadora process is the policy we should pursue. It has not really had a chance to succeed since the administration has given only lip service to supporting it. It is time that we wholeheartedly support it. We would have the support of the rest of Central America to vigorously pressure Nicaragua to reduce its armed forces, expel its foreign advisers, honor its borders and cease support for insurgencies in neighboring countries.

Apart from the need to cease aid to an ineffective group of men who spread violence and terror, it is appalling that aid should be sought at a time when the President is proposing deep cuts in vital programs providing nutrition, health, education, job training and other vital services to our disadvantaged and vulnerable citizens. It is inconceivable to me that we can consider sending funds to support a suspect, no-win terrorist group while contemplating budget reductions that would endanger the health and welfare of so many of our own citizens. Continued funding of the Contras would be counterproductive both to our national security and to the domestic stability of our country.

CONGRATULATIONS CARROLL BEAVER

HON. GENE CHAPPIE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. CHAPPIE. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to take this opportunity to recognize Mr. Carroll Beaver who will be retiring from the California Department of Forestry. Throughout Carroll's 35 years of service in northern California, he is best known for his leadership as captain of the air attack base in Grass Valley. Due to his spirit of compromise and adaptability, Carroll successfully engineered the merging of the California Department of Forestry with the Grass Valley Fire Attack Base. In doing so, he helped to provide the most effective air attack fire protection service in the State.

In addition to Carroll's active duty with the forestry, he is respected in his community as a model citizen and as a supportive father who has reared 10 children.

As Carroll approaches retirement this May, I congratulate him on his many contributions to northern California and wish him the happiest of years to come.

THE TIDE OF FREEDOM RELIES ON AMERICA'S STRENGTH

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, America's historic destiny has been to raise freedom to its fullest expression not just in the United States but throughout the world. This is the greatest hope of oppressed peoples throughout the world. Thankfully, since 1981, America has experienced a resurgence of confidence in its ideals, and not surprisingly, the tide of freedom is now just beginning to overwhelm and overcome the forces of tyranny and repression in many areas throughout the world.

Yet we are in danger of undercutting the military strength that strengthens and emboldens the new march of freedom. Some are even suggesting that the defense budget experience another famine cycle in the years ahead, threatening, once again, the deterioration of America's defenses and all that means for the cause of freedom-fighters and democracy throughout the world.

The following article warns that America's defense preparedness and combat readiness efforts are beginning to be sacrificed in some significant ways as a short-term expedient to reduce the deficit. I commend the following article to my colleagues, and earnestly urge that this year and beyond Congress provide a defense budget adequate to our weighty responsibilities and historic destiny.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Apr. 8, 1986]

LOGISTICS OFFICERS FRET THAT GRAMM-RUDMAN MAY HINDER U.S. MILITARY COMBAT READINESS

(By Tim Carrington)

TINKER AIR FORCE BASE, OKLA.—This sprawling archipelago of parts warehouses and aircraft workshops is the military's biggest logistics center, keeping thousands of warplanes and related systems ready for combat. But officers here are fretting that Washington will scrimp on the funds needed for military readiness.

The source of apprehension is the Gramm-Rudman deficit-reduction law. The fear is that the Pentagon, as it did during past budget crunches, will squeeze funding for maintenance, repair, training and transportation in order to insulate big-dollar weapons programs from cuts. Already there are some early signs that today's budget pressures will hurt military readiness. Moreover, the threat that the U.S. arsenal will be less ready comes at a time when the president is using the military more often as a diplomatic and political tool around the world.

The fears appear to be well-grounded: Although the overall Air Force budget would grow by 7% under the Reagan administration's request for fiscal 1987, proposed funding for Air Force spare parts would drop 40% from the levels planned a year ago. Lloyd Mosemann, Air Force deputy assistant secretary for logistics, says, "I anticipate that we won't fund spares as completely as we did."

ENGINE EXHAUSTION

"When you have a reduction in logistics money, you can't buy the spare parts to replace fuel controls, etc.," says Maj. Gen. William Bowden, commander of the Tinker logistics operation. "At some point, you end up with engine exhaustion."

Others offer more dire prognoses. "The U.S. faces the real prospect of entering the 1990s with shiny, new, high-technology forces that look impressive but cannot roll or sail or fly to where they might be needed," says the Committee for National Security, an independent research group, in a recent budget study.

Because it takes about two years for parts to be delivered, funding shortfalls today won't create noticeable readiness problems until about 1989. Nonetheless, here are early signs that such problems may be brewing:

The B-1, the Air Force's newest bomber, already faces parts shortages here at Tinker, where the planes will be maintained and overhauled. According to Gen. Bowden, this year's Gramm-Rudman cuts dipped into dollars earmarked for stocking up parts for the aircraft. "Gramm-Rudman will have an impact on the B-1," he says. "We still have a lot of parts to buy for it." It's uncertain whether future appropriations will allow the Air Force to catch up on the parts purchases.

At Fort Bragg, N.C., the 82nd Airborne Division absorbed a $10 million cut as a result of the Gramm-Rudman automatic reductions that took effect March 1. The bulk of this came from training for the paratroopers.

According to Air Force Gen. Lawrence Skantze, "Some of the spares have been hit in the Air National Guard and the Air Force Reserve, and they've cut their flying hours."

There is strong congressional pressure to cut or even eliminate the funding program for the C-17, considered to be the primary cargo plane for the 1990s. Although this new aircraft is central to current plans for carrying U.S. troops and equipment to battle, airlift programs have perennially been more vulnerable to budget cuts than submarines and jet fighters.

Funding for the millions of widgets and wrenches that keep the military arsenal running has long followed a cicle of feast and famine. During the slow-growth 1970s, hundreds of planes and ships were essentially out of commission because the Pentagon hadn't bought the parts needed to keep them combat-ready. The Reagan administration then poured money into spare-parts purchases, raising the levels of combat-ready equipment and "mission-capable" aircraft. However, the Reagan administration's parts-buying blitz spawned so-called horror stories of grossly overpriced wrenches and hammers, which in turn helped undermine public support for defense spending. Now, the military appears to be back on the brink of the famine side of the cycle.

CALCULATED GAMBLE

Past compromises of readiness didn't occur inadvertently. Pentagon officials describe high-level meetings in the 1970s in which senior officials called for "rubber on the ramp," a code word for finished weapon systems, rather than the parts and training needed to support them. One Pentagon official characterizes that trade-off as a "calculated gamble" that was premised on an assumption that U.S. troops wouldn't soon be called into action.

Gen. Skantze insists that the Pentagon won't sell readiness short as it did in the 1970s. "Rather than field 40 or 44 wings that aren't fully equipped to do combat missions, we would field 38 that are fully equipped." he says. "The leadership philosophically is committed."

Whether that commitment holds up as program managers begin competing for limited funds remains to be seen, however. Cuts in the Air Force requests for spare-parts funding in fiscal 1987 call it into question already. Moreover, pressure will be particularly acute in coming years with the Air Force planning to move the costly Stealth bomber into full production and to begin building the next generation of jet fighters, known as the advanced tactical fighter.

Some of the funding cuts in readiness actually cost money in the end. For example, cutbacks in spare parts in the 1970s meant the Air Force repair centers had to fly parts in from remote points just to carry out their maintenance work. "In the 1970s, we had accelerated transportation for one out of every two parts," says Gen. Bowden. Moreover, faced with pinched budgets, military buyers end up ordering parts in small quantities, thereby driving up units costs.

Pinched budgets for readiness may also choke off needed improvements in how parts and repairs are managed. Gen. Bowden plans to add a new computer system in a vast workroom where Tinker employees manually record the comings and goings of thousands of aircraft parts that cycle through the facility. Funding for the computer project appears shaky, however. And at the Pentagon, budget planners working on the administration's request for fiscal 1988 have already halved the Air Force's early request for logistics research and development, which involves work on ways to modernize the spare-parts and repair process.

SALE OF CONRAIL

HON. DOUGLAS APPLEGATE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, a constituent of mine, Mr. Wade S. McGuire, a widely respected retired railroader from Uhrichsville, OH, has written to me about the proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk-Southern Railroad Co. There are few who know as much about railroads and the importance of rail service, as Mr. McGuire. Even though, I am not in full agreement with his conclusions that Norfolk-Southern's bid is in the best interest of Conrail and those that are dependent on Conrail, I nevertheless, believe that he deserves to have his point heard, and that is why I request that the text of his letter be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Following is the text of Mr. McGuire's letter:

Congress created Conrail from parts of seven debt-ridden and worn out railroads in the Midwest and Northeast which were the victims of an ongoing "national unbalanced transportation policy", i.e., in order to avoid an economic and industrial catastrophe within the region.

As of January 1, 1976, the projected net liquidation value of all assets transferred to Conrail by the affected railroads was $422 million. (Sources: Final System Plan, dated 7-26-75, prepared by the U.S. Railway Association (Pages 126 and 144—Volume 1).

On February 6, 1984, the U.S. General Accounting Office advised me that at the end of 1983, the federal government had invested $6.955 billion in Conrail. A large part of these tax dollars was spent for labor protection, reconstruction of routes and feeder lines identified in the Final System Plan and to settle mammoth claims of the seven carriers which contributed to the formation of the Corporation on April 1, 1976. Contrary to popular belief, all physical assets of the "seven railroads" were not conveyed to Conrail.

Subsequently, Conrail management proceeded to undermine the intent of the Final System Plan, ostensibly to cut operating costs and the size of the workforce, the latter having been reduced by over 59,000 since 4-1-76. From 1976 through 1985, Conrail's annual freight tonnage had dropped by approximately 115 millions of tons. During this time the Corporation initiated a program of railroad destruction unparalleled in the history of American railroads. To speed up the demolition process, Conrail prevailed upon Congress to enact the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981, a law that handed management arbitrary authority to destroy or eliminate priceless automatic signals, control towers, transmission lines, yards and thousands of miles of track. Between 1976 and 1984, Conrail had removed 3,754 miles of track while their mentor, Morgan Stanley, proposes to reduce the present 14,000 miles of track to 9,000 or less. Conrail's tear-outs are equivalent to a rail line extending from Washington, D.C. to London, England. In 1985, this Corporation laid off 3,200 employees, nearly 10 percent of its personnel. Conrail also proposes to eliminate 1500 jobs per year through 1989. (Source: Congressional Record—Senate, 99th Congress, dated 1-26-86.) These are some of major factors which brought about a sizeable reduction in the value of Conrail's physical assets as well as a loss of revenue traffic.

For instance, at Cadiz, O., a village and the county seat of Harrison County within the Appalachia Region—the poorhouse of America, was a 1.4-mile industrial track serving two small companies. From 1976 through 1981, these two little industries received 723 long-haul carloads of revenue freight and paid Conrail over $2,513,000 in transportation costs. On November 13, 1981, Conrail served notice that the Corporation intended to destroy the line under the authority vested in the Northeast Rail Service Act. NERSA stripped these small enterprises and county officials of any semblance to the right of due process. This 1.4-mile track, which had been upgraded to meet Federal Railroad Administration standards, was subsequently scrapped and another spike was driven into one more coffin in the Appalachia Region.

Another classic example of Conrail management's lack of sound judgment was the 192-mile Panhandle trunkline which extends from Pittsburgh, Pa. to Columbus, O. This double-track, high speed, automated mainline, the shortest connecting link to the South and Southwest from Pittsburgh, was rebuilt after 1976 at a cost of tens of millions of tax dollars. Prior to 1984, following the reconstruction involving new welded rail, switches, signals, wayside poles, train loads of ballast and tens of thousands of new cross ties, Conrail proceeded to destroy the authomatic signal systems and eliminate one main track, together with most of the passing sidings.

Congressman Douglas Applegate (18th District) became appalled after learning of the unjustified destruction and waste of tax dollars that had taken place on the Panhandle, as well as on other segments of this federally-owned railroad, and he introduced H.R. 3332 (98th Congress—1st Session) into Congress, a Bill having for its purpose to prohibit Conrail from destroying any of its public-owned rail facilities, i.e., until a final disposition of the Corporation was made. H.R. 3332 was blocked in committee with Conrail leading the opposition. Why? Had Congressman Applegate's Bill prevailed, the savings to the U.S. taxpayers would have been measured in hundreds of millions of dollars (based on the Panhandle experience) and today Conrail's physical assets would have been far more valuable on the taxpayers' auction block.

In 1975, a railroads for National Defense Program was initiated whereby a 37,500-mile network of Class A mainlines of the nation's railroads was identified as the Strategic Rail Corridor Network (STRACNET) for national defense.

On January 26, 1982, Major General John D. Bruen, Department of the Army, Military Traffic Management Command, addressed a letter to the writer wherein it was revealed that the Panhandle was a part of STRACNET, and important to national defense by tying Ohio, West Virginia and Pennsylvania into this military railroad network. On June 1, 1982, Anne Higgins, Special Assistant to President Reagan, advised in writing that the Panhandle would remain available to handle defense shipments. On August 19, 1982, Conrail management issued a memorandum wherein the carrier proposed to scrap key sections of the Panhandle, which would have rendered the route useless as a connecting freight and/or defense corridor. In other words, to hell with the national defense—full speed ahead for the Conrail wrecking ball.

On May 20, 1983, the U.S. General Accounting Office issued a "Report To The Secretaries of Defense and Transportation" dealing with "Federal Actions Needed To Retain Essential Defense Rail Service" for national defense. This alarming report, describing the Strategic Rail Corridor Network and the Panhandle connection, disclosed that from 1979 through 1982, there were 453 railroad abandonment application filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and many of these petitions affected defense installations that required rail service. In fiscal years 1980 and 1981, there were 94 military installations with a maintenance backlog of $11.4 million. In September 1981, the U.S. Army revised its estimate to the effect that it would cost $30.1 million to upgrade rail facilities at only 23 military installations, i.e., at a time when Congress is spending hundreds of billions of dollars to upgrade U.S. defenses.

While this G.A.O. report was being prepared, Conrail was busy tearing out millions of dollars worth of good rails, tieplates, angle bars, cross ties and other railroad material, i.e., at a time when rail lines leading to defense installations were deteriorating. There was no mention made in the G.A.O. report that Conrail had offered to provide the U.S. Defense Department any surplus, government-owned track material for use on deteriorated rail lines leading to these defense installations.

It is ironic that certain members of Congress, after the federal government had invested hundreds of billions of tax dollars east of the Mississippi River since World War II to construct and maintain the heaviest concentration of interstate highway and waterway systems within the United States, would oppose the Norfolk Southern's bid to establish for the first time a single-delivery rail network in this same region for the purpose of providing an efficient, cost-competitive, tax-paying rail transportation system. The weighty subsidized interstate highway and waterway systems east of the Mississippi River were a major factor in the railroad bankruptcies which contributed to the birth of Conrail. This railroad has paid no federal income taxes since it was created, and will not do so under Morgan Stanley, i.e., as opposed to Norfolk Southern who paid over $150 million in federal taxes for 1984. (Source: Congressional Record—Senate, 99th Congress, dated 1-22-86).

Perhaps never in the history of modern railroading has an occasion presented itself, in the form of a NS-Conrail merger, for a railroad to challenge the tax-supported competition of the highway carriers, the inland and coastal waterway bargelines and the airlines.

Therefore, under the "equal protection of law doctrine" of the U.S. Constitution, the proposed Norfolk Southern acquisition of Conrail should be approved by the U.S. House of Representatives. This would give NS a clear block to move freight trains to and from the ports on the Great Lakes, the Atlantic Seaboard and the Gulf of Mexico, i.e., to service points east of the Mississippi River just as the trucks and barge operators are now freely able to do. For the first time, the nation would have a single-delivery railroad complex that could make a tremendous contribution to the rebirth of the depressed industrial and economic bases east of the Mississippi River, i.e., whether or not it involves the movement of freight to the North, East, South or West therein. Contrary to the P.D. editorial, which never mentioned the subsidized competitors who are killing off the Iron Horse, the Norfolk Southern proposal doesn't smell, it portends nothing but good for the public, the shippers and the affected employees located east of the Mississippi River.

THE REVEREND DR. CLYDE J. BOWMAN HONORED

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, on April 26, 1986 St. Paul's Union American Methodist Episcopal Church [UAME] in New Haven, CN will host a luncheon in honor of the Reverend Dr. Clyde J. "Bobo" Bowman. Dr. Bowman is retiring from the active ministry in May of this year after 42 years of service, the last 15 years as the minister at St. Paul's.

A pastor in the UAME church for 39 years, Dr. Bowman has distinguished himself with his dedicated community service. In 1960 he was appointed to the position of pastoral supervisor for the five boroughs of New York City by the late Bishop David Mr. Harmon. Dr. Bowman has also served as district superintendent of the northern New Jersey, New England, and central New York State areas. In 1982 he was elected to the positions of general secretary of the book stores and general secretary of education by the UAME General Conference. In addition, Dr. Bowman has been a member of the faculty at Boulden Academy and Seminary since 1947.

Since coming to New Haven in 1971, Dr. Bowman has been highly active in community work and the city government. He is the Protestant chaplain for the New Haven city Police Department and the former chairman of the city of New Haven's Board of Ethics. In addition, Dr. Bowman is a former member of the Greater New Haven YMCA's Board of Directors and a current member of Chapter 346 of the International Rotary Club. A theologian and teacher of high distinction, he has been a pastor of 10 churches within the United States and has developed 23 ministers, eight while in New Haven.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have Dr. Bowman as a constituent and join with his many friends, associates, and loved ones in honoring him for his many accomplishments and thanking him for his long commitment to the people of Connecticut's Third Congressional District.

A CALL TO CONSCIENCE

HON. J.J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, a special emergency Leadership Conference on Higher Education was held in Washington, DC, to address the current proposals being made by the administration with regard to funding for educational programs.

Present at this meeting were more than 55 university presidents and chancellors from all around the country. The following statement was introduced by Robert L. Hardesty, the president of Southwest Texas State University, in my district. The statement was unanimously adopted as the position of this very representative group of higher education in this country.

In the statement, these educators point out that education is essential in building an economic base to compete in the future international marketplace. In the high-technology, information-oriented world of the future, the most educated nations will come out ahead in every area of endeavor.

I applaud the efforts of Robert L. Hardesty, and the rest of the education leaders who came to Washington to communicate their strong feelings on this subject, and I call on the Congress and the President to continue the commitment we have made to make sure all members of our society have the opportunity to receive a good education. While we all know that we face budgetary restraints, let us hope we can fashion a budget that will recognize the great importance of education.

I am submitting, for the RECORD, a copy of the statement, "A Call to Conscience":

A CALL TO CONSCIENCE

Proposed reductions in federal support seriously threaten American higher education. Its future for decades to come will be affected by the decisions Congress makes in this budget and appropriations cycle. But the issue is greater than the future of higher education; the issue is the future of the nation.

America's best hope for economic prosperity is education. Growing competition in the international market place can only be met through more—not less—educational opportunity. Research and technological developments are needed to produce the jobs of the future, and quality education is needed to develop the talents of all our young people to meet the challenges of the future.

And yet, education is being held accountable for deficits which it did not create. From 1980 to 1986 the federal deficit doubled in constant dollars while education expenditures declined by 16 percent. Reductions in student aid include the elimination of social security education benefits, and the decline of veterans' educational benefits.

We are troubled by the notion that the national defense can be strengthened while weakening education. We remind the nation that education is an essential component of the national defense: there would be no military force without educated manpower, no technical military superiority without engineers and scientists trained on the nation's campuses.

Proposed federal cutbacks would affect an estimated 3 million out of 5 million students presently receiving aid, forcing them to drop out or change their college plans. Such cuts strike particularly hard at minority enrollments, which already have been losing ground: while more blacks and hispanics are completing high school, fewer are attending college.

Such losses are unacceptable to a nation committed for the last thirty years to making higher education available to every young person who has the ability and desire to pursue it. Such losses are unconscionable for a nation committed to racial equality and equal opportunity. Educational excellence is not possible without equal access: the federal role in guaranteeing that access is paramount, representing 75 percent of total national expenditures for student aid.

As college and university presidents and leaders of higher education, we represent millions of American students whose futures hang in the balance of federal budget and appropriations decisions. It is time we spoke out for them—clearly and forcefully.

It is time, too, that we remind the nation that education is fundamental to the quality of life in our democratic society, as well as to our economic security and our national defense. It is time to bring education back to the forefront of our national priorities.

We call for a reordering of federal responsibilities to recognize education as our best hope for the future.

This is nothing less than a call to conscience.

FLORIO PRAISES SENIOR MEALS PROGRAM

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the efforts of an outstanding services organization in my congressional district, the Senior Citizen Holiday Meal Program, Inc.

The Senior Citizen Holiday Meal Program is an all-volunteer program devoted to serving elderly shutins and the homeless. The organization prepares and delivers more than 3,500 meals on Thanksgiving, Christmas, and Easter to seniors who might otherwise be deprived of food and companionship on these important occasions. Ironically, this program was established in 1981 in response to cutbacks in Federal funding for a country meals program.

Unfortunately, the need for the services of the Senior Citizen Holiday Meal Program continues to grow in south Jersey, as does the need of the program for additional resources and funding. In order to encourage private sector support for its efforts, the Holiday Meal Program has organized a 250-mile, eight-county walk through southern New Jersey. The walk, conducted by Steven DiOrio, executive director of the program, will take place between April 14 and 20, 1986, and is intended to highlight the plight of the elderly, as well as generate funding and volunteers for the program.

PRAISE FOR JOHN McCLELLAND

HON. GENE CHAPPIE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. CHAPPIE. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to take this opportunity to recognize John McClelland for his dedication to the California Department of Forestry. John will be retiring as fire captain of the El Dorado Fire Station after more than 34 years of service in northern California.

Besides John's involvement with the forestry, he has been instrumental in the Pioneer Fire Protection District, the largest all-volunteer fire protection district in California, functioning as the fire chief. Futhermore, he is an active member of the El Dorado Fire Chiefs Association, as well as the California Conference of Arson Investigations.

Within the community, John has continually volunteered his time. He served two terms on the Pioneer Union School District's Board of Trustees and he is currently a member of the Air Pollution Appeals Board.

John's commitment to fire protection, and to the betterment of his community, have earned him the praise and respect of his peers. I too, join in admiration of his contributions and wish him a happy and healthy retirement.

INCREASED EXCISE TAXES SHOULD BE DELETED FROM TAX REFORM

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, tax reform is supposed to create a level playing field for all industries. Yet increasing discriminatory and deleterious excise taxes only riddle the playing field with large tax differentials that hurt certain industries, their employees, and their customers. I will work to delete these regressive excise tax changes from any final tax reform plan, and I hope my colleagues will join me in this effort. The testimony below by the president of the New York State Wine Grape Growers, John H. Martini, shows that the excise tax increase is a matter of fairness, growth, and jobs. I commend this testimony to my colleagues.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN H. MARTINI, PRESIDENT, NEW YORK STATE WINE GRAPE GROWERS, INC.

I am a farmer. A simple statement but one that I feel has to be made. Together with my wife, Ann, and our four children, I grow grapes in a small vineyard in the Finger Lakes Region of New York. In the national view of things we are certainly small potatoes; but we are real and struggling. I am not here to bemoan the plight of agriculture, either my own or others, but I am here to express our concern that a further burden might be placed on the shoulders of grape growers everywhere.

There is in this Capitol city a perception that, to raise necessary funds and at the same time reduce personal taxes, it would be a good idea to raise the excise tax on wines. It is not to be a nominal increase, mind you, but a whopping 400% increase. The rationale eludes me but I feel it is based on some weak premises. A.—Only the rich drink wine and they'll never notice. and B.—all the increase can be passed through to the consumer with no loss in sales. I will try to address the fallacy of these premises in giving a brief sketch of what such a tax will mean to the grape growers of New York and their communities.

Wine is grapes—directly and succinctly. Juice from grapes natually ferments to produce a like amount of wine. Wine, therefore, is an agricultural crop and was recognized as such before Jesus Christ turned water into wine at Cana. Wine is food and a beverage of moderation that belongs on the dinner table of the American family. It is part of the heritage our ancestors brought with them when they came to these shores in search of the future. I recall Thomas Jefferson's words, "No nation is drunken where wine is cheap; and none sober where the dearness of wine substitutes ardent spirits as the common beverage. It is, in truth, the only antidote to the bane of whiskey."

To be part of that heritage I grow grapes, specifically I grow wine grapes, along with hundreds of other farmers in New York. These grapes we grow have no value other than that which they find in wine. They include American varieties such as Catawba, hybrids such as Seyval Blanc and vinifera such as Chardonnay. The vineyards dot the beautiful scenery of the Finger Lakes, the shores of Lake Erie, along the history rich Hudson Valley and most recently the fertile and gentle tip of Long Island. New York State is grape country. Those grapes produce many and varied wines rich in style and differences. We growers can be and are proud of them.

So how are things down on the farm? As with all agriculture it has not been rosy. The domestic grape and wine industry has been experiencing hard times in recent years. Average returns for grapes in New York have declined for the past five years. In New York we have seen our market share fall from roughly 12% in 1970 to 4% in 1985. Dessert wines, which historically have been a good outlet for our grapes, have gone from a 28% share in 1970 to a 6.8% share in 1984.

In New York alone wine grapes accounted for just shy of 20 million dollars of farm income annually. That income was primarily spent on labor. Grapes are a labor intensive crop, each vine, there are 600-700 per acre, must be touched 3-5 times every year. Cornell University estimates that each 20 acres of vineyard requires a one man-year equivalent. In the Finger Lakes we have lost 1000 acres in the last several years. That's fifty people not earning income dollars. Those dollars once found their way into refrigerators, stoves, clothing and food. The communities in the grape growing regions suffer reduced revenues as vineyard acreage declines. Not only in fewer dollars spent but also in reduced property tax income (vineyards are taxed at a higher rate than is bare farmland).

The factors that affect our livelihood are complex but we are making efforts to surmount them. The State of New York has put up $2,000,000 to fund the New York Wine/Grape Foundation. The State sees the value in retaining an industry that ranks second to California in grape production and that has within its borders the oldest winery in the United States. We have a proud tradition and we want to preserve it. An increase in excise tax will strike another blow at our already wobbly segment of agriculture.

Small estate wineries have blossomed recently in New York and manage to survive but I feel it important to point out that they do not support the grape industry. My "bread and butter" as a grape grower is the Taylor Wine Co. and their Lake Country Series of wines. These wines are called non-premium or popular-priced. Such wines and their counterparts from California and other states account for 79% of domestic production. Call them jug, call them cheap, call them what you want; but do not call for an additional tax on them. They are sold to a very price sensitive segment of our population. Any decline in sales will result in a direct reduction in grapes needed by the vintners. That will mean more vineyards abandoned, bankrupted or foreclosed.

If we assumed that the proposed excise tax will decrease the sales of non-premium wines by 20%, even only briefly, there will be, in New York, no need for approximately 14,000 tons of grapes. That translates into over 3,000 acres, 150 people and 50-75 farms. Grapes are perennial and capital intensive. One does not get in and get out. If the vineyards are abandoned or lost one year they can not be resurrected the next without great financial inputs.

Some will say that rather than increase the retail price the industry should and can absorb the tax and not pass it on to the consumer. As growers we suspect that an attempt will be made to pass part of the tax in our direction. We can not absorb a further decline in the prices we receive for our grapes. The expenses for cultural inputs have increased to the point where it costs over $1100.00 an acre to operate a vineyard in New York. The 5 ton per acre average yield does not cover those costs with $139.00 per ton grapes. (1985 estimate). There is no more blood in this stone; ask our bankers, they may well be the grape farmers of the future.

It seems that the federal government, in its collective wisdom, wishes to sacrifice part of its agricultural heritage in some type of Peter to Paul exchange that they can call tax reform. There will still be wine here, it will pour in from Europe, Argentina, Chile and from nearly everywhere else in the world that grapes are grown. Dollars will pour out into foreign treasuries. Wine imports have already risen to 30% of the domestic market. The juice and wine industry of this country imported 7,512,982 gallons of grape concentrate in 1985. As grape growers we will see more and more of cheap, imported concentrate go into domestic wines at our expense.

Perhaps with the hoped for increase in revenues the federal government might consider a whole vineyard buy out plan and save us all some agony. This tax will be regressive in it's effect on the New York grape industry.

It will cause:

Continued loss of jobs, farms and livelihoods.

A serious erosion of local community tax base.

Increased imports of wines and juices.

It will not cause:

A reduction in the national debt.

Moderation in alcohol consumption.

An improvement in the balance of trade.

Thank you for your time and concern.

PETER BROWN RUFFIN

HON. CHARLES ROSE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, the North Carolina World Trade Association will hold its 22d annual conference beginning April 30, in Wilmington, DC, with serious issues on its agenda, and I want to call those issues to the attention of the Members. They have been outlined by Robert J. Mack, a Wilmington businessman and president of the North Carolina World Trade Association, in an article in Carolina Cargo, which I am including with my remarks. The article also mentions a distinguished group of Wilmington business people who will make the meeting a success, including Peter Brown Ruffin, the honorary chairman, who is called, accurately, "one of North Carolina's most distinguished shipping executives."

The article follows:

NORTH CAROLINA WORLD TRADE ASSOCIATION 22D ANNUAL CONFERENCE

WILMINGTON, NC.—Peter B. Ruffin, one of North Carolina's most distinguished shipping executives, will serve as Honorary Chairman of the 1986 Annual North Carolina World Trade Association Conference beginning April 30th in Wilmington, N.C.

The announcement was made on Feb. 10, 1986 by Robert J. Mack, president of the NCWTA, who stated that Mr. Ruffin's acceptance of this role in this year's conference was the "cornerstone to a truly successful meeting here in the Port City."

The N.C. World Trade Association's annual meeting will be held at the Wilmington Hilton Inn, April 30-May 1, 2. This year's theme is "Global Trade—The Hard Choices." Early reservations for the conference can be made by calling Marcy Hege at Associated Services in Raleigh, N.C., (919) 851-2901.

"Since Mr. Ruffin has spent most of his adult life in Wilmington as part of the shipping and maritime community, it is only appropriate that he be the honorary chairman of the 1986 world trade meeting," Mr. Mack said.

Mr. Ruffin serves as chairman of the board of Wilmington Shipping Company. He served as chief executive officer of the company from the time of its founding in 1945, to October 1983.

Wilmington Shipping Company operates a branch in Morehead City, N.C. under the name of Morehead City Shipping Company. Its subsidiary, Southern Overseas Corporation, is a custom house broker and foreign freight forwarder with offices in Wilmington, Morehead City, Charlotte, and Norfolk, Va., Charleston, S.C., and Savannah, Ga.

Other key committees and chair persons were also named by Mr. Mack for this year's conference. They include:

Tim B. Malaney (Lavino Shipping Co., Wilmington) general chairman; Mrs. Marcy Hege (Associated Services, Raleigh) general administrative; William Lassiter (NCWTA, Cape Fear Chapter, Wilmington) programs; Ms. Barbara Blanton (Sea-Land Services, Inc., Wilmington) entertainment/recreation; Mrs. Tim Malaney, spouses' programs; Joseph Augustine (Greater Wilmington Chamber of Commerce) finance; Bill Stover (N.C. State Ports Authority) and Gayle Johnson (Merrill Lynch) publicity and public affairs; John Bauer (City of Wilmington) and Mrs. Fran Willard (Southern Overseas Corporation) logistics and coordination; Mrs. Mary Bruce (L. C. Bruce and Associates, Raleigh) and Mrs. Bonnie Helms (Bonnie Helms, Ltd., Monroe) awards.

"These key individuals will supply the force behind our conference this year," Mr. Mack said.

In explaining this year's conference theme, the NCWTA president noted:

"The character of today's economy dictates a re-evaluation of thinking by the entire international shipping community in regards to global trading. Protectionism, the fluctuation of the dollar, overseas crises, the cost of marketing, the price of 'not' marketing are all issues facing each and every one involved in international commerce.

"Whether it be a custom house broker, a freight forwarder, a steamship agent or a port official, problems arise daily which have to be addressed . . . and sometimes the solutions are not always evident," he said.

"The same is even more true for the shippers themselves or the manufacturer contemplating shipping. It is no longer easy for these companies to compete internationally.

"North Carolina's traditional industries have suffered the consequences more than most in this country. Textile firms are closing and tobacco farmers are having to diversify their crops to survive.

"These are just some of the many issues we hope to cover at this year's North Carolina World Trade Association conference. Our speakers are being asked to address the 'hard choices' facing us and offer some concrete answers as to how to make the 'right' choices when they encounter them," Mr. Mack said.

BLAME FOR THE LIABILITY INSURANCE CRISIS

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, the crisis in the liability insurance industry has exploded beyond the ability of States to effectively regulate it. Insurance regulation, traditionally relegated to the States, needs to be critically and objectively examined by this body.

It is imperative that this inquiry be conducted in an objective manner. I fear, however, that the predetermined conclusions of the media and the Reagan administration's own task force on tort reform have prevented this necessary objectivity. Serious investigation into the practices of the insurance industry is essential, and we must not blindly accept the assertions and anecdotes of those who blame the tort system as the lone culprit in creating and proliferating the liability insurance crisis. Many factors have created this crisis, not the least of which is the insurance industry itself.

Congress must not fall into the same trap as have the media and the administration. We cannot abdicate our responsibilities as fact finders, and succumb to the insurance industry's highly effective media campaigns.

Bob Hunter, the widely respected Federal Insurance Administrator under Presidents Ford and Carter, is also deeply concerned about the reluctance of the media and others to look beyond the hype and into the facts. Mr. Hunter expresses these views very cogently in a Washington Post article which appeared on April 13. I am inserting this incisive article into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the benefit of my colleagues.

The article appears below:

THE INSURANCE INDUSTRY IS TO BLAME: SO WHY CHANGE THE LEGAL SYSTEM?

As a Republican and as federal insurance administrator under President Ford, I am appalled that the Reagan administration has proposed limiting compensation to severely injured people as a "solution" to the insurance crisis.

I am even more appalled that the administration has refused even to consider the possibility that insurance mismanagement and the McCarran-Ferguson Act, which allows insurance companies to fix prices, may be at least partly responsible for skyrocketing insurance rates.

But I am most appalled at the Post's endorsement of the administration's approach [editorial, April 1] and particularly at its lack of analysis in making that endorsement.

For example, the Post calls the following recommendations by the administration "sensible":

Limiting damages for pain and suffering to $100,000. This means that a 17-year-old girl who contracted vaginal cancer and had to undergo a total hysterectomy and vaginectomy because her mother took the cancer-causing drug DES could recover no more than $100,000 for her inability to have children or have normal sexual relations.

Limiting punitive damages to $100,000. (Actually, the administration recommends limiting punitive damages plus damages for pain and suffering to a total of $100,000.) In the Ford Pinto case, Ford deliberately did not make an $11 improvement in the Pinto gas tank because it calculated that the cost of the improvement was greater than the benefit of avoiding the 180 deaths and 180 burns it estimated would occur without the improvement. Ford was held liable for millions in punitive damages, and it fixed the Pinto gas tank. Under the administration's proposal the maximum Ford would have to pay in punitive damages would have been $100,000—less than half what Ford calculated a human life to be worth in doing its cost-benefit analysis.

Eliminating joint and several liability. Under current law, if an asbestos worker dying of mesothelioma (asbestos-caused cancer) worked with asbestos made by more than one manufacturer, he can recover his damages from any of those manufactures, and it is then up to the asbestos makers to settle among themselves. Under the administration's proposal, if the mesothelioma victim cannot establish the degree to which each asbestos manufacturer contributed to his injury, he recovers nothing from any manufacturer.

Limiting contingency fees. Plaintiff's lawyers, who today typically get one-third of the total recovery if they win and nothing if they lose, could receive no more than 10 percent of any verdict above $3,000. Defense lawyers, on the other hand, who are paid by the hour and thus have an incentive to keep their meter running, would not have their fees limited.

Perhaps even more unusual than the Post's conception of what is sensible is the reasoning it uses to conclude that compensation to severely injured people should be limited. Because nurse-midwives can't get insurance, The Post asserts, there must be something wrong with the legal system. Yet only 3 percent of nurse-midwives have ever been sued—exactly what one would expect, because nurse-midwives do only low-risk deliveries. Insurance companies are refusing to insure nurse-midwives not because they are paying out claims against nurse-midwives but because they are trying to "change the widely held perception that there is an insurance crisis to a perception of a lawsuit crisis," as the Insurance Information Institute has candidly put it.

Former GEICO chairman John Byrne has put it even more candidly. "Is it right for the industry to withdraw and let the pressures for reform build in the courts and in the state legislatures," Byrne told an audience of insurance company actuaries last summer, just before insurers stopped writing certain lines and rates began skyrocketing.

The most candid insurance executive of all, however, may be American International Group President Maurice Greenburg, who recently admitted that it was price cutting in the early 1980s "to the point of absurdity"—and not the tort system—that is responsible for the industry's current problems. Greenburg told an industry conference that if insurers had not cut prices but had merely held them constant there would not be "all this hullabaloo" about the tort system.

In creating still more hullabaloo about the tort system, The Post cites a Philadelphia case in which a woman supposedly recovered money for loss of her psychic powers, and a study by the Rand Institute that found that punitive damage awards had risen dramatically. Had The Post bothered to read the case and the study, however, rather than rely on what insurers and the administration say they say, it would have found that the judge in the Philadelphia case specifically prohibited any award for loss of psychic powers, and that the Rand study found that the median jury award, when adjusted for inflation, has remained constant since 1960. The Post might also have found that the punitive awards it criticized were well deserved—particularly in view of the lack of any criminal penalties to deter reckless corporate behavior.

As federal insurance administrator, I was able to persuade both President Ford and President Carter—this time with The Post's editorial support—to support no-fault auto insurance, which was very substantial tort reform. Before deciding to limit the amount people can recover in certain auto-accident cases, however, we got the data, and we provided an alternative compensation system for injured people whose recovery would be limited.

We did this because we found that severely injured people received only about half their out-of-pocket loss under the tort system, while those with relatively slight injuries received five times their out-of-pocket loss. Our recommendation to eliminate the right of people with limited damages to sue but in exchange to guarantee them prompt payment of their economic damages made sense; capping awards, which would limit the amount recoverable by the severely injured—who were already being undercompensated—would have been cruel and nonsensical.

To what extent are victims of business, professional and medical negligence being compensated under the present system? We don't know because the insurance industry has continually refused to disclose how victims fare under the present system and how proposed reforms would affect system costs and victim welfare. The disclosure of such data would allow legislators to decide intelligently what, if any, reforms in the legal system were needed.

Isn't The Post even a little curious about what the data would show?

THE COLQUITT COUNTY ARTS CENTER

HON. CHARLES HATCHER

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. HATCHER. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, April 13, I had the privilege to participate in the dedication ceremony for the Colquitt County Arts Center in Moultrie, GA. I mention this today, because the men and women who worked to establish the center deserve special credit for raising over $1 million without the help of local, State, or Federal Government funds. The fund-raising effort was successful because so many citizens and businesses of Colquitt County donated to a cause they felt would bring great benefits to all of the people of Colquitt County. They have set an example for other rural areas throughout our Nation and are to be commended.

I am proud to be a supporter of the arts. Through my work on the congressional arts caucus, I am given the honor of boosting the arts throughout our great Nation. It is especially thrilling to witness accomplishments of the private sector on behalf of the arts in my own district, especially during a time in our Nation when we must reduce Government involvement in our lives in order to sustain financial solvency.

I am hopeful that word of the success of the Colquitt County Arts Center will spread throughout Georgia and our great Nation, and that it will provide inspiration for countless other communities to bring together businesses and families in an effort to promote the arts in rural areas. That goal, I am proud to say, has been realized in Moultrie, GA, and the quality of life there has certainly been enhanced. Thank you.

INTRODUCTION OF FARM CREDIT SYSTEM BORROWERS RIGHTS ACT

HON. JIM ROSS LIGHTFOOT

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, enough time has now elapsed for us to see inadequacies in the Farm Credit System restructuring legislation we passed late last year. In the haste to preserve the Farm Credit System [FCS], I'm afraid Congress may have been more worried about saving the system than about saving the borrowers, even though the legislation was passed with the best of intentions.

The time has come to make some adjustments in that legislation, for the sake of the borrowers who depend on the Farm Credit System. For that reason, I'm introducing legislation today to better protect FCS borrowers' rights.

The measure will protect borrowers in several ways. It ensures that borrowers have access to information affecting them. Although the Farm Credit System restructuring legislation we passed provided some assurances in this regard, better guidelines are needed.

The bill will also prevent the FCS from foreclosing or accelerating loans if borrowers are able to become current on their loans. I've heard repeated accounts of noncooperative behavior on the part of Farm Credit System institutions in such matters. There is no reason that the Farm Credit System cannot sit down and negotiate with borrowers.

Furthermore, my legislation will guarantee a farm family's right to retain their home and up to 10 adjoining acres for at least 3 years, providing reasonable rent is paid and the farmland remains in operation.

Finally, I've discovered a problem with the use and disposal of FCS-owned land. To ensure fairness, the legislation will require FCS to offer any land they intend to sell through local realtors on a competitive listing basis. It will also require leases to be accepted on a competitive basis. In light of plummeting land values in the Midwest, the bill would also prevent FCS from selling land it holds if those sales would further depress local land values.

Although it is tempting for Congress to view the issue of Farm Credit System legislation as closed, I urge your consideration and cosponsorship of this relatively simple, yet important measure. Farm borrowers of the Farm Credit System still need our help.

THE URBAN HOMESTEAD ACT OF 1986 AND PUBLIC HOUSING RESIDENT MANAGEMENT ACT OF 1986

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, the chance to own a home has long been considered one of the underpinnings in the stability of the democratic system, causing families to aspire and save, and providing equity and new faith in free enterprise.

Today, I am joining together with Congressman FAUNTROY and a group of my colleages to sponsor two bills to extend the dream of homeownership to thousands, perhaps millions, of low-income familites in public housing projects. We share a strong belief that homeownership is not just for higher income Americans. It's a dream shared by all Americans, regardless of income and background. And we believe government should do all it can to facilitate broad ownership of housing to as many Americans as possible, especially low-income families. These families face large financial barriers to owning their home, not the least of which is their inability to deduct mortgage interest and property taxes.

First, Congressman FAUNTROY and I are cosponsoring the Public Housing Resident Management Act of 1986. This bill, which was developed with the guidance of hundreds of tenants and community leaders, gives public housing residents greater control over the management of public housing communities and allows them to set up resident management groups.

Our bill trims regulations, streamlines resident management certification and bonding procedures, and allows public housing resident groups to retain any savings they make in operating and maintaining their communities. This creates a new and powerful incentive for public housing communities to become more efficient, better managed, and more responsive to the needs of the residents themselves.

We know that resident management works because we have seen many examples of how residents reduced costs, improved maintenance and the quality of life, created new jobs and opportunities, and even ameliorated difficult problems such as drug abuse and teenage pregnancy levels.

Once public housing residents have taken control over their communities, perhaps reducing high operating costs and making their communities more desirable, many residents will want to own their homes. Our second bill, the Urban Homestead Act of 1986, lays the foundation for resident management groups who want to own their homes.

Our legislation would give every resident group the guaranteed opportunity to purchase their homes at a 75 percent discount and with no money down. But we also provide assurances and protection for non-buying residents. Our legislation guarantees that no public housing resident may be evicted if he or she does not want to purchase their home. Resident management groups will also be provided with training, and with technical and management assistance, to prepare them for assuming the responsibilities of homeownership.

Both the Urban Homestead Act and the Public Housing Resident Management Act of 1986 are integral parts of one strategy: To empower public housing residents with greater control over their lives, their homes, and their neighborhoods. Both bills could strengthen the ability of millions of renters to become successful homeowners.

But the core purpose of this legislation concerns more than just buildings and homes. Homeownership means bringing some tangible results of the economic recovery to people of modest means. It means giving low-income Americans some hope and a sense of accomplishment. It means fostering the spirit of community in troubled neighborhoods by multiplying those invisible bonds of respect, companionship, and caring among men and women. It means greater stability in home life. It means civic pride, greater security, and a real stake in the free enterprise economy.

This is not the last word in housing policy, and we remain ready and willing to improve and adapt our legislation as necessary. But we have broad, bipartisan support for the goals of this legislation. Liberal and conservative, Democrats and Republicans and Independents, blacks, minorities, and whites alike, Congress and the administration—all can join enthusiastically in extending the dream of homeownership to more Americans.

John F. Kennedy was right when he said that:

One of the greatest challenges of the next decade is the challenge to provide a decent home in a decent neighborhood for every American.

If we pass this legislation, we can begin to meet that challenge and turn some troubled housing communities into pictures of working and living and hope.

A TRIBUTE TO DR. KENNETH B. CLARK

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, a truly great educator who has retired from the New York State Board of Regents.

Dr. Clark is best known for his research in 1954 on the damaging psychological effects of the "separate but equal" doctrine. He presented evidence that racially segregated education in and of itself inhibits the intellectual growth of black children. The myth that quality education could be provided in separate facilities was exploded by Dr. Clark. It was his report that was instrumental in persuading the Supreme Court to end racial segregation in the classrooms.

Kenneth Clark later served the New York Board of Regents for 20 years, strengthening education standards for children in New York. He never compromised his belief in academic excellence. His most fundamental belief was that all students, regardless of race or class, should be given an equal chance to achieve. This was his ideal, and this was his goal.

Mr. Speaker, New Yorkers will miss Dr. Clark. I wish him the very best in the future. I submit the following article for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From the New York Times, Mar. 24, 1986]

A CONSCIENCE OF EDUCATION

Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, the educator, is perhaps best known for a study of the damaging psychological consequences of "separate but equal" schooling, a study that in 1954 helped persuade the Supreme Court to outlaw racial segregation in public schools.

But over the years, New York has benefited mightily from Dr. Clark's 20 years of service on its state Board of Regents. His retirement from the board last week marks the departure of a soft-spoken but effective advocate of quality education for all students.

In debates of educational standards, he never pleaded for relaxing them for the sake of the disadvantaged. Keep standards high, he said, but make sure the underprivileged get the opportunity to achieve them. He is therefore satisfied that the Regents Action Plan, which stiffened high school graduation requirements, puts the state on the right track for educational reform. Disappointed that local school boards have not met the needs of disadvantaged students, he now proposes that "chronically underachieving" schools be placed under the Regent's direct authority.

71-059 O-87-22 (Pt. 6)

Dr. Clark's combination of compassion and unflagging devotion to educational quality led his colleagues to describe him as the "conscience" of the board. He will, no doubt, continue to espouse provocative, controversial and sensible ideas. But his day-to-day involvement in efforts to improve education's equality will be widely missed.

MEDICARE PART A DEDUCTIBLE TO RISE—HERE WE GO AGAIN!

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as an original member of the House Select Committee on Aging, I am outraged over preliminary reports from the Department of Health and Human Services which indicate that the Medicare part A deductible may jump to $572 from the current $492 on January 1, 1987.

This dramatic increase of almost 17 percent comes as millions of senior citizens are reeling from the effects of the 23-percent increase in the deductible which took effect on January 1 of this year. When you consider the past 2 years and the expected increase for next year, the increase is in excess of 50 percent.

Meanwhile the main source of income for many of these seniors, Social Security, has seen its benefits increase by just over 7 percent. Expectations about the 1987 COLA do not indicate that the rate will be much above 3 to 4 percent based on inflation.

The fact is, we must take steps now to avert a catastrophe which will affect millions of seniors on January 1 if this increase is allowed to take effect. It is time to put a cap on the part A deductible increase—a cap which is based on the comparable percentage of the Social Security COLA for a given year. Last year I cosponsored legislation authored by the distinguished chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging, Mr. ROYBAL, to impose such a limit. Next week I intend to introduce an identical bill to limit the increase to the Social Security COLA. In order to offset the lost revenues, my bill will propose an increase in the Federal cigarette tax with all revenues earmarked to the Medicare hospital trust funds.

According to the Washington Post, one of the reasons given for this projected increase relates to the prospective payment system adopted for Medicare in 1983. As the article states:

Ironically, the prospective increase results from success in holding down Medicare's preadmission costs and reducing average lengths of stay. Increases in the first day payment are based on the average Medicare costs per hospital stay. A new Medicare system for paying hospitals gives them a flat fee for each stay, providing an incentive to discharge patients quickly. With length of stays declining, but payment per stay remaining constant the first day is now a larger proportion of the total payment. The average hospital stay is under 9 days.

This represents but another in a steady number of examples of how the DRG system has worked to partially solve one problem but create others. Clearly, DRG's have worked to lower costs to the Medicare system which was essential to avert the imminent bankruptcy of the Medicare trust funds which loomed so ominously several years ago. However it is interesting to note the fact that the latest projections of the trustees of the Medicare funds indicate that the date of bankruptcy has suddenly moved forward to 1996 perhaps indicating that the impact of DRG's have run their course.

Meanwhile fundamental issues related to quality of care for seniors continue to be raised. Our Aging Committee has documented a number of cases involving the premature discharge of seniors from hospitals. The so-called quicker and sicker problem appears to be a growing one across the Nation and must be addressed. Now we learn that another quality of care issue, higher out-of-pocket costs to elderly Medicare recipients, may be another outgrowth of DRG's which must be addressed.

I hope on a bipartisan fashion we can work to avert an increase of this type from occurring several months from now. HHS has done its job by warning us about the possibility. Let us do our job for the seniors of our Nation and pass appropriate legislation to protect them from continued financial abuse associated with never ending increases in out-of-pocket costs to participate in Medicare.

LEGISLATION TO PROTECT HAWAII VOLCANOES NATIONAL PARK

HON. DANIEL K. AKAKA

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to enhance and protect one of the Nation's most unique national treasures and one of my State's greatest visitor attractions—Hawaii Volcanoes National Park. This measure will enable the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park to acquire a 5,650-acre tract adjacent to its present boundaries.

The parcel of land, which is presently unused, has been the National Park Service's acquisition priority in the Pacific area for more than a decade. This tree-fern rainforest, populated with native ohia, contains the habitat of the endangered Hawaiian Hawk and Hawaiian Ou as well as several other species found only in the Hawaiian archipelago. Congress identified the parcel as suitable for "potential wilderness" in 1978. Except for its non-Federal status, the tract possesses all the necessary attributes for wilderness designation.

While these considerations are enough to warrant the inclusion of this tract within the national park, there is a different but equally important concern which should be known. The growing of marijuana on this tract poses a serious threat to public safety. Marijuana growers often booby trap their patches to intimidate anyone who might inadvertently come upon their illegal activity. Park Service vigilance has eradicated marijuana growing within the confines of the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park and that same vigilance will also end marijuana growing on the contiguous land area once it is added to the park.

Over the past 5 years, this important tract of land has also been the focus of other activities. In early 1982, its owner revealed plans for large-scale geothermal development on the land. Approximately 50 geothermal wells were proposed as close as 1,000 feet from the park boundary. Four proposed powerplants were to be located within 4,000 feet of the park. While the State of Hawaii recognizes the need to develop alternatives to nonrenewable energy resources and has emphasized this need through State legislation, we also recognize the importance of maintaining the integrity of Hawaii's largest national park. The adverse effects of geothermal emissions, surface disturbance, noise, odor, and vista impairment in close proximity to the park would have serious consequences. Such development would cause the deterioration of native plant and animal communities, fragmentation of the ohia fern forest essential for endangered native bird survival, degradation of the wilderness quality of the east rift and Kalapana extension areas, and destruction of present and future visitors' perceptions of the park.

After 2 years of searching for a means to satisfy these competing interests, a solution has been found that will allow geothermal development while removing its adverse effects from the immediate vicinity of the park. In December 1984, on the recommendation of the State board of land and natural resources, the owner of this tract was encouraged to consider a land exchange with the State of Hawaii. At the same time, the State encouraged the National Park Service to find a way of acquiring the tract for inclusion into Hawaii Volcanoes National Park. The State of Hawaii then began to consider the possibility of a three-party land exchange with the Federal Government that would allow the National Park Service to acquire this important parcel contingent upon the State and the landowner moving forward with their two-party exchange.

After several meetings among the State, the National Park Service, and the landowner, I come to you today to tell you that such an agreement can be achieved. However, Congress must enact legislation to allow the Department of the Interior to become a third party to this exchange agreement.

We should remember that Congress recognized the need to adjust the boundaries of the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park through the addition of adjacent lands early in the park's history. In 1938, Congress passed legislation that allowed the Secretary of the Interior to add adjacent tracts to the park if, in the discretion of the Secretary, they are judged to be "necessary for the proper rounding out" of the boundaries. While the Secretary has had this discretionary power for nearly 50 years, he has been restricted by the provision that allowed acquisition of certain tracts through donation only.

The reasons for limiting the acquisition of adjacent parcels to donated land have long been forgotten. The public accepts and supports this acquisition proposal. The people of Hawaii, the landowner, and the National Park Service agree that the time for acquisition is now at hand. Times have changed and we must change with the times. The three party land transfer is the type of change that is appropriate at this time; a time when no or low cost acquisition alternatives are needed in the context of the Federal deficit.

The benefits of this legislation are self-evident. First, the 5,650-acre tract of virgin rainforest would become part of the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park, offering protection to endangered species and popular visitor attractions, allowing representation of this unique ecosystem in the National Park System, and facilitating National Park Service administrative control over the land for the purposes of public safety. Second, and equally important, geothermal development could proceed in an area well removed from the park. Furthermore, geothermal development could proceed immediately without the burden of continued hearings, protests, appeals, and threats of court actions which have held development to a standstill over the past 4 years. Third, there would be no need to seek major appropriations from Congress for the acquisition of the land at a time when budget considerations are on the minds of every Member of Congress. Finally, the more than 2½ million visitors that come to the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park from all parts of our Nation each year will enjoy the benefit of an appropriate expansion of the State's natural treasures.

Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleagues will join me in this effort to preserve the pristine beauty of this wilderness area. With this legislation, we will ensure that future generations can continue to enjoy the splendor of the Hawaii Volcanoes National Park.

SPIRIT OF GIVING?

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, in the next several days, the House will consider the supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1987. One of the topics to be discussed is the Combined Federal Campaign [CFC] which has proven over the years to be highly effective in collecting large amount of contributions from Federal workers for charitable organizations. The Office of Personnel Management has fought to change the regulations governing the Combined Federal Campaign to drastically limit the number of charitable organizations which would be allowed to participate in the CFC.

The CFC has experienced a 50-percent increase in total donations since it opened up to a broader cross section of charities in the early 1980's. The OPM's new regulations would drastically decrease the amount of contributions from the Federal workers. Moreover, the regulations would discriminate against the many organizations that would be excluded. The attached commentary from April 17 issue of the New York Times aptly describes the dilemma CFC is currently facing.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 17, 1986]

GENEROSITY WASHINGTON CAN AFFORD

Armed with a favorable Supreme Court ruling, the Reagan Administration has finally succeeded in removing groups it doesn't like from the roster of charitable organizations that benefit from annual fund drives among Federal workers. Congress should reverse this narrow-minded policy.

In the annual campaign, Federal employees authorize payroll deductions for charities listed by the Government or written in by themselves. Last year the drive raised $130 million for more than 150 national and many more local charities. About $6 million went to groups serving minority, women's, environmental and other interests that were added to the Government list in 1980 and 1981 at the initiative of the Carter Administration.

The Reagan Administration began at once to try to roll back that policy and limit Federal employees' giving to organizations managing health and welfare programs. In 1983 it ordered the exclusion of organizations that engage in any "advocacy, lobbying or litigation," a ruling promptly challenged on First Amendment grounds. Last July the Supreme Court ruled that the order was constitutional but sent the case back to a lower court to decide whether the executive order excluded groups solely because of their political views.

Meanwhile, the Office of Personnel Management has issued new rules to eliminate all advocacy groups from this fall's campaign and to prohibit write-ins. A measure before the House would restore all charities that participated in the last campaign. Such looser rules would express Government's generosity of spirit at a time when it has chosen not to be particularly generous in spending.

HOUSE CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL: IOSIF BEGUN

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to light once again the tragic yet heroic case of Soviet prisoner-of-conscience Iosif Begun. To some, such repetitive appeals to the Soviet Government may seem futile. However, the recent release of prisoner-of-conscience Anatoly Shcharansky is evidence that public outcry and political pressure can be effective in forcing the Soviet Union to live up to its obligations under the Helsinki human rights accords.

Mr. Begun has spent 8 of the last 14 years of his life in internal exile and in labor camps, all of this for the crime of applying to emigrate to Israel in 1971. Subsequent to his visa application, Mr. Begun was stripped of his job. The Soviet Government refused to hire him and he was effectively barred from working except in a nongovernment, and thus unofficial, capacity. Mr. Begun gave Hebrew and Jewish culture lessons, an occupation for which he was vilified in the Soviet media. In 1977, he was arrested for being unemployed, a situation which the Soviet Government had made unavoidable. Mr. Begun served 2 years of exile in Siberia. After his release he was arrested again for returning to his home without a residence permit. This time, he was sentenced to 3 years of internal exile. Following a brief period of freedom, Iosif Begun was charged with anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda, and sentenced to 7 years in a labor camp.

Given the number of Soviet Jews who have received similar treatment at the hands of the Soviet Government, it has become obvious that it is the intention of that Government to stamp out Jewish cultural identification. By arresting those who teach Hebrew and Jewish culture to young Jews in the Soviet Union, the Government seeks to prevent the continuation of the Jewish heritage through another generation. The seriousness with which the Soviet Government has sought to suppress Jewish culture is obvious in both its brutal treatment of Soviet Jews—especially those who preserve and teach the proud Jewish tradition—and in the existence of such organizations as the Anti-Zionist Committee of the Soviet Public, which directs the official anti-Jewish propaganda compaign. It is essential for those of us who are in a position to speak out against such a compaign to do so loudly, clearly, and as frequently as possible so that the Soviet Government is aware that its activities are not something which they can hide from the rest of the world.

Last October, I wrote a letter to President Reagan urging him to bring up the case of Mr. Begun in his conversations with General Secretary Gorbachev during their summit in Geneva. My wife, Wren, helped to form the Congressional Spouses Committee of 21 along with the spouses of 20 other U.S. Representatives. As part of her committee work, Wren adopted Mr. Begun and has corresponded regularly with both him and his family for the past year. She has also written to both President Reagan and General Secretary Gorbachev about the plight of Mr. Begun and his family. These efforts have not yet resulted in success. However, given the recent release of Anatoly Shcharansky, I am encouraged about the potential for gaining Iosif's freedom if we continue to pressure the Soviet Government to respect its citizens' basic human rights.

Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that we convince the Soviet Union that we are serious when we speak about the basic rights of human beings. They must realize that whether we express our concern in terms of appeals to their sense of humanity or in concrete diplomatic, political, and economic policies, their harsh treatment of Soviet Jews will continue to color our perceptions of every activity that they undertake.

SALUTE TO PAST PRESIDENTS OF THE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL OF NORTHEASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

HON. PAUL E. KANJORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, the Economic Development Council of Northeastern Pennsylvania (EDCNP) is a regional research, planning, and development organization serving the seven counties of Carbon, Lackawanna, Luzerne, Monroe, Pike, Schuylkill, and Wayne in northeastern Pennsylvania. The council has served the region since 1964, as a nonprofit corporation representing the public and private sectors. Its board of directors includes a wide range of dedicated volunteers incluidng elected and appointed officials and private sector representatives who contribute time, energy, advice, technical assistance, and financial resources to help promote and improve the quality of life and sound economic growth within this 4,500-square-mile region of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and its 266 local governments, 7 county governments, and 907,000 residents.

The year 1986 marks the 21st anniversary of the Appalachian Regional Commission, an organization representing 13 States of this great Nation who have joined together in an intergovernmental partnership designed to establish a basis for positive economic change. Since the commission's inception in 1965, through the designation of local development districts representing a sound public/private sector partnership of local officials in common unity to achieve economic growth, much has occurred to label the Appalachian Regional Development Program (ARDP) as one of the outstanding intergovernmental and public/private sector programs. The EDCNP has been a designated local development district under the ARDP since the inception of the commission. Through the years, each of the presidents of the EDCNP has contributed greatly to the ability of northeastern Pennsylvania to not only effectively utilize the ARDP, but to constructively integrate the Appalachian Program with other Federal, State, and local incentives to encourage better economic activity, through an innovative grant and loan program which has been the lifeblood of a part of the United States which, for many years, was left behind the rest of the country. The EDCNP has been in the forefront and a leader in the ARDP, and its presidents have strongly helped to direct the way in which these funds have been effectively utilized for the benefit of the region's citizenry.

The EDCNP has successfully utilized some $80 million in ARC funds to leverage $291 million of other financing, thereby creating over 12,000 new jobs in our region. This is truly an outstanding accomplishment and a tribute to the leadership demonstrated by the nine past presidents of the EDCNP.

The EDCNP presidents are being honored tonight, April 17, 1986, at an EDCNP board of directors meeting being held at Pocono Manor, in Monroe County. The presidents have represented the region at Federal and State levels and have managed a staff devoted to providing professional and technical advice to the local public and private sectors, resulting in a wide range of projects and programs crucial to the region's economic stability and growth.

The presidents being honored and their terms of office, include:

Louis G. Feldmann	1964–67
John S. Davidson	1967–70
John B. Hibbard	1970–73
Ernest D. Preate, Sr	1973–76
Thomas P. Shelburne, Sr	1976–78
Paul R. Stewart	1978–79
Vivian P. Edwards, Jr	1979–81
Roy E. Morgan	1981–83
Sandurn Sutherland (present)	1983–86

The uniqueness of the EDCNP partnership is the combined role of the public and private sectors. The EDCNP has the largest local membership participation program in the Nation with respect to the 600 regional councils serving the United States. Each year, it raises close to $240,000 with a membership which exceeds 450.

It is with great pleasure and honor that I bring the achievements of these people and the Economic Development Council to the attention of my distinguished colleagues. The EDCNP has exempified the outstanding contributions possible from working together in a truly public/private partnership. The presidents of the EDCNP are to be commended and honored for their hard work, dedication, and commitment to improving the economic and social well-being for thousands of residents in northeastern Pennsylvania.

TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM CROSKEY

HON. DOUGLAS APPLEGATE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of Mr. William Croskey, a distinguished constituent and personal friend of mine who will be retiring from 36 years of service in the teaching profession at Steubenville High School.

Mr. Croskey is a life-long resident of Steubenville and has been educated in the Steubenville public school system. Ever since a very young age, Mr. Croskey has been an active member of his community—his debut beginning at age 7, when he traveled to and entertained in most of the States on the east coast as a member of the Singing Boys of America. During World War II, when he was a high school youth, he participated in a musical group which entertained in the local area U.S.O.'s.

Following Mr. Croskey's graduation from Steubenville High School in 1947, he went on to Kent State University where he pursued his undergraduate and, later, his graduate degree in education, having been inspired from his work as a counselor for the Los Angeles Crippled Children's Society. He subsequently went back to his former high school, Steubenville High School, to begin his first teaching job.

During his 36 years at Steubenville High School, Mr. Croskey has been an extremely active faculty member, serving as an adviser to the Hi-Y Club for 14 years, as chairman of the Bicentennial celebration in 1976, as chairman of the social department, in addition to his most recent position as community arts chairman. He has also been instrumental in instilling the spirit of our Government to groups of students which he has been bringing to visit Washington for many years. Needless to say, his presence will be sorely missed at Steubenville High School.

Mr. Croskey has also been actively involved in community service organizations in and around the Steubenville area including: the local Kiwanis Club, the Elks, the Mason's, the Scottish Rite, and the Knight Templar.

Mr. Croskey is also a world traveler, having visited not only the majority of States in the United States, but also making voyages to Europe, the Middle East, Africa, the Caribbean, and South America. In addition, he is an avid swimmer and he enjoys boating.

Mr. Speaker, Mr Croskey's commitment to education and dedication to civic organizations within his community are truly an inspiration to all who know him. To mark his departure from Steubenville High School, I ask that my colleagues join me in wishing him the best of luck in all of his future endeavors.

LET US RECOGNIZE THE HUMAN SUFFERING CAUSED BY OUR TRADE POLICIES

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, As the House continues its consideration of trade reform legislation, I would like to share with my colleagues several thoughts as expressed by two members of the United Mine Workers of America yesterday before the Subcommittee on Mining and Natural Resources' hearing on imported coal.

I believe these excerpts from their testimony are worth reading and contemplating upon because they emphasize the human factor in the debate on trade. All too often we get bogged down in technical minutia when we discuss foreign trade and fail to recognize the harsh toll being extracted on domestic workers due to unfair foreign trading practices.

As I noted yesterday at the subcommittee hearing, coal imports are on the rise and this trend is attributable primarily due to the lack of health, safety, and environmental requlation and costs in the countries responsible for exporting coal to this Nation—Colombia and South Africa. I do not believe the coal miners of the Appalachian region should have to mortgage their, and their children's future to Colombia and South Africa. I also do not believe the United States should be taking a step backward from its efforts toward more fully utilizing its domestic energy resources.

For these reasons, I have asked the Subcommittee on Trade to approve H.R. 1905, legislation to impose an $8 per ton duty on imported coal and to amend our trade remedy laws so they give consideration to the difference in the cost of complying with Federal health, safety, and environmental standards imposed on the coal industry in this country compared to complying with like standards in a competing country.

Mr. Speaker, the excerpts from the testimony of Mr. Mike Browning, vice president, UMWA District 17, and of Mr. Donald McCamey, vice president, UMWA District 28, follows:

Mr. Browning:

In the past the Government of the United States has never hesitated to call upon their working people to protect them. Yet, when those same workers and their families are in need of protection our cries are often ignored or even worse, belittled.

The American workers and the American workers loved ones have never failed to protect our Nation and the values it represents. Now we call upon America to protect its workers and our values, indeed our way of life. We think its about time that the act of protection became a two-way street.

It is likely that our concerns will not be heard by the current administration. It appears to the working person as though the United States is doing everything it can to assist multinational corporations to the continued detriment of the people it supposedly represents. It is obvious to say that the administration supports free trade rather than fair trade.

Aided by that policy, the American corporations as in the Exxon Colombian case are permitted to move more of our jobs overseas. We therefore plead with you today to take immediate action to protect the jobs of the patriotic working men and women of our country.

Mr. McCamey:

America, you are a giant among Nations and I thank God I have been permitted to live in this land. You are as varied as the fingerprints of the hands of your citizens. And to you, our representatives, who are our leaders at this critical time in our history, I call upon you to not permit this giant to sleep as Gulliver did in Jonathan Swift's novel. I ask you to make this Nation arise to the task of survival, lest we be ensured with the greed of men and multinational corporations.

"Daily I see the hopelessness in the eyes of coal miners in my district, men who once were proud citizens contributing to the Nation's economy and providing for the needs of their families. In 1982, we had 11,000 active union miners in my district. Today there are only 5,300. These miners have cleaned up their act. They have reduced their lost time accidents. The wildcat strike is almost a thing of the past. The production per employee is up about double what it was in 1982. But over half are now unemployed while this Nation and multinational corporations use their tax dollars and the profits from their labor to export their jobs to foreign shores.

I want to leave you with one quote. It is found in I Timothy, the fifth chapter and the eighth verse of the Holy Bible and it reads thus:

"But if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel."

ARTISTS' SPACE CRISIS

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a serious crisis currently facing New York City: the lack of space for our artists and arts organizations. I recently testified at a hearing called by New York State Assemblyman Jerrold Nadler on the issue of artists' space. The text of my statement follows:

I wish to commend Assemblyman Nadler for calling this hearing to focus attention on what is fast becoming a major crisis in New York City: lack of space for one of its foremost industries, the arts. For us in New York City, the arts are not only a source of pride and cultural enrichment—they are big business. The arts contribute over $5.6 billion to the economy of the region, generating over 117,000 jobs, enriching hotels, restaurants, real estate, utilities, transportation, medical and education services, and the finance and insurance industries.

I have the good fortune to represent, in the 17th Congressional District, a large number of musicians, writers, painters, dancers, actors and artists of all disciplines who reside and work there. Hardly a week goes by when we do not receive a call from an individual artist or arts organization in desperate need to living, rehearsal, exhibition, or performance space. The problem is compounded by the fact that these artists and arts organizations lack the expertise to enter the world of finance and real estate, which the space chase requires of them.

New York City acts as a magnet to artists from all over the globe. In 1984, of the 4,000 awards made nationwide by the National Endowment for the Arts, 1,000, or 25 percent, went to New York City artists and arts organizations. We are the crucible for new talent and new theatre, music, dance and visual arts. In the past, low rents and an abundance of space enabled us to extend this hospitality to aspiring young artists and struggling arts organizations. Landlords in transitional neighborhoods welcomed them to the frontier areas of Manhattan. But the artists became the victims when the economy boomed, rents escalated, and real estate speculators and developers moved in.

Theatre groups and dance companies have the most serious difficulties because they need large spaces for rehearsal and performance. My office has been in contact with the New York City Department of Cultural Affairs and the Office of Economic Development in behalf of the Dance Artists Nationwide Space Emergency to underscore their need for advice and technical assistance. I find disheartening the results of a national survey of non-profit theaters showing that in spite of improved fund-raising efforts, rising deficits threaten their continued development. What is most distressing is the fact that while corporate and business support grew by 11 percent in 1985, federal support, once the leading source of theatre funding—has grown by less than one percent since 1981.

Visual artists face similar problems because diminishing exhibition space has drastically limited opportunities for them to present their work. In an effort to assist with this problem, my office has contacted a number of corporations and government officials encouraging them to provide wall space for exhibiting arts organizations. This effort resulted in the Regional Administrator of the United States General Services Administration offering exhibition space to the Contemporary Artists Guild for an exhibition at the federal office building at 201 Varick Street.

The Committee for Cultural Facilities, an unusual and exciting consortium of arts groups, has the strong backing of our office in their efforts to lease three floors of the Old United States Custom House. We hope that the Reagan administration will not torpedo these plans by turning over the Customs House to the Indian Museum.

In Clinton, we continue to ask the city to abandon its plans for the Urban Renewal Area Sites 7, 8 and 9C and go back to the drawing boards. The plans do not adequately protect the non-profit groups now on the sites. We are particularly disappointed that the city has not followed the original concept to sell the building on Site 7 to the Women's Interact Center.

The arts are not self-supporting. They cannot live on what they earn. They depend on government and the private sector for support. If they boost prices, they limit their audience; if they minimize risk, they limit their creativity. Government must support the arts and respond to its needs. We must explore ways to shield the arts community from the ravashes of the marketplace. If we care about encouraging our nation's artistic and cultural life, if we care about the economic vitality of our city, we must act quickly or face the irreversible erosion of our priceless cultural resources.

A STATEMENT IN SUPPORT OF REVENUE FOREGONE

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the chairman of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Civil Service, Post Office and General Services, the Postal Rate Commission will be undertaking a study to examine the use of most categories of "preferred rate" mail. The study will be reviewed by the House and the Senate for uses in the fiscal year 1987 budget process. The Postal Rate Commission is currently receiving comments on the subject of preferred rate mail and is holding public hearings across the country to enable interested persons to discuss indepth all of the matters under consideration. Attached are my written comments which I submitted to the Postal Rate Commission for their consideration.

In providing revenue foregone appropriations each year, the Congress has played an important role in allowing the Postal Service to establish a preferred rate mail system for nonprofit organization across the country. Many of our national goals are met because of the diligence of these organizations. Because of the budget cutbacks in many of our domestic programs, our Nation must rely on these nonprofit organizations more than ever to have many of our people's needs addressed.

For several years now the current administration has proposed to eliminate the revenue foregone appropriations thereby threatening the livelihood of many nonprofit organizations. Notwithstanding, we in Congress has successfully fought back to maintain certain levels of the revenue foregone appropriations.

I have been deeply concerned about the cuts in revenue foregone appropriations, and am hoping that the study the Postal Rate Commission will be undertaking will show Congress that truly legitimate organizations must continue to receive their well-deserved subsidy.

STATEMENT SUBMITTED TO THE POSTAL RATE COMMISSION ON PREFERRED POSTAL RATES

I commend the Postal Rate Commission for agreeing to undertake a study on "preferred rate" mail which will greatly assist those of us in Congress to make fair and just decisions on FY'87 appropriations for revenue foregone.

I have been a member of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service for eight years, and throughout my term with the committee, I have supported revenue foregone appropriations.

What is revenue foregone? To me it is a special partnership between the government and nonprofit organizations that was established even from the beginnings of the American Postal Service to carry out important national goals. There are organizations such as the American Cancer Society, the March of Dimes, the American Heart Association, and so many more who rely on contributions from the American people to carry out critically important missions for our nation. A key function of many of the nonprofit organizations is to keep Americans informed of pertinent issues that affect them and our country. But even more important function is to raise needed funds for just causes. The organizations rely greatly on our nation's mail system to carry out these functions. Our government has provided revenue foregone appropriations which have allowed the Postal Service to provide the nonprofit organizations lower postal rates in order to assist them in carrying out their special missions.

I am baffled by this Administration's insistence for the past six years to eliminate revenue foregone appropriations. It is this same Administration that has been promoting the idea of getting the government off the backs of American people. Subsequently, funds for social welfare and educational programs have been cut. If the American government chooses to take on the burden of addressing problems of the needy, who takes on that burden? It is the multitude of nonprofit organizations across America. By eliminating revenue foregone appropriations, the Administration is proposing to forego the welfare of our American people. I hope that through the study on preferred postal rates, we would be more certain of the absolute necessity of maintaining that special partnership between the government and the nonprofit organizations.

Today, I would like to speak on behalf of the public libraries, the unions, and the minority nonprofit organizations that would be severely impacted by any further reductions in revenue foregone appropriations. Basically, the greatest threat of eliminating or further reducing revenue foregone appropriations is to the freedom of the press. Libraries, unions, and minority nonprofit organization rely much on revenue foregone because a mission of paramount importance to these organizations is distributing information. Libraries send braille and recorded books to users; unions send out important news that affects their members; minority nonprofit organizations keep the minority communities up-to-date with issues that affect them. Certainly, these organizations are not receiving revenue subsidy unnecessarily. We live in a democratic country that places much importance in making sure the citizens are aware of issues that impact them. These nonprofit organizations would not be able to sustain themselves properly if revenue foregone subsidy is eliminated or reduced such that they are forced to keep up with the first class postal rates. Now, if we eliminate or reduce revenue foregone appropriations, are we not restricting distribution of information to the American public?

In light of the fact that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings has already taken effect, it appears that the entire population is currently facing some of the ill-consequences of fiscal restraint. But the Postal Rate Commission's study is timely and absolutely necessary. In midst of fiscal contraint, the study will assist us in making sure that legitimate organizations would continue to receive their well deserved revenue foregone subsidy.

THE FIFTH PILLAR OF SOUND MONEY

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, the fifth pillar of sound money is the principle of fiscal policy. It asserts that the credit of the government must be maintained at the highest possible level, and then all other problems will take care of themselves. Just how far the credit of this Government has deteriorated over the years can be measured by the high rate of interest and the shrinking maturity structure of the public debt.

However, the credit of the Federal Government can be restored to its former high level, if we refinance the public debt at 2½ percent interest, by issuing gold bonds with 25 years maturity, as my bill, H.R. 4401, proposes.

THE FIFTH PILLAR OF SOUND MONEY AND CREDIT: THE PRINCIPLE OF FISCAL POLICY

(Antal E. Fekete)

A Chinese Tale

Once upon a time there were, in China, two great cities: Chin and Chan. They were connected by a magnificent canal. One day the Emperor sent for his chief mandarin, Ching, and said: "Look yonder". Ching opened his eyes and looked. And he saw scores of barges laden with cargo, plying between the ports of Chin and Chan. The Emperor then commanded: "We must stop that traffic, in order to increase employment in the Celestial Empire. You will have huge blocks of stone thrown into the canal to put it out of service." At first Ching did not see the point, and said: "Son of Heaven, you are making a mistake." However, the Emperor's mind was made up, and he said: "Ching, do as you are bid. We are going to stimulate the economy. You come back after three moons have passed, and take another look."

When he came back, the Emperor said: "Look yonder." As he looked, Ching saw thousands of carts and innumerable pedestrians carrying heavy burden on their shoulders, as they were making their way from Chin to Chan, and from Chan to Chin. They looked like a swarm of migrating ants. The Emperor declared: "It was the destruction of the canal that provided jobs for these poor people. We shall make it public policy to stimulate the economy by all available means." Ching remarked in admiration: "I should have never thought that the government could create so many jobs so quickly and so easily."

When the Emperor died, his successor sent for Ching and ordered him to have the canal reopened. Ching prostrated himself nine times and said to the new Emperor: "Son of Heaven, you are making a mistake." But the Emperor was adamant: "Do as you are bid. We must facilitate the movement of people and goods between Chin and Chan, by making transportation less expensive. Then the people may have rice, tea, and silk at a lower cost." Ching thought he was ready with the answer: "But what is the use of lower prices, if no one can pay them, because everyone is unemployed?" The Emperor was losing this patience: "Ching, you are talking like a fool. Come back after three moons have passed, and take another look."

When Ching came back, the Emperor said: "Look yonder". Ching looked and saw more traffic in the canal than anybody had ever seen before. The barges were moving day and night, bumper to bumper. There was no hint of unemployment. The Emperor dismissed Ching with these words: "You can divert and displace labor, but you can never create new employment by erecting obstacles. Remember the wisdom of the old sages, that the secret of good government is to leave people alone." (Adapted from Frederic Bastiat's "Sophismes économiques," Paris, 1845.)

Quality of Credit

The sole aim of fiscal policy is to keep the credit of the government at the highest possible level and above all suspicion. This principle implies that the government borrows only if it can see the revenues which, in the years coming, will be available to retire the debt. If this principle is respected, then the rate of interest will be stable, and it will be the lowest possible rate consistent with economic conditions. Otherwise, the rate of interest will be higher and unstable, moreover, the rise and instability will be commensurate with the extent to which this principle has been compromised. This will make it difficult for some, and impossible for other private producers of wealth, to reinforce their enterprise by borrowing.

The quality of credit in a country cannot be higher than that of the government. Therefore, the deterioration of the government's credit adversely affects every single producer in the country.

The canal carrying the trade between Chin and Chan symbolizes a national economy that respects the principle of fiscal policy. By deviating from this principle, the government puts the canal out of service. The blocks of stone symbolize the higher rate of interest which private producers of wealth pay after all the borrowing needs of the government are satisfied. This would not stifle the national economy, but would certainly render it more inefficient.

A dilution of the principle of fiscal policy is usually couched in a language which would appeal to those susceptible to demagogy. Deficit spending is called "priming the pump", "an essential stimulus to the economy", indispensable to the maintenance of full employment. Yet it is clear that the stimulus of deficit spending is at best dubious in the short run, and completely absent in the long run. The short-term effects have the nature of prestidigitation, as government spending can be targeted to pockets of slow economic activity, in order to produce spectacular results. It is the long run effects where the damage to the economy becomes visible.

Accumulation of Public Debt versus Accumulation of Capital

The accumulation of public debt is a convenient trick through which a temporary semblance of prosperity may be achieved. In the long run, however, this policy will only aggravate the situation, as it harms the economy by weakening productive capacity. The longer the government succeeds in maintaining false prosperity by increasing public debt, the greater the ultimate damage.

Mainstream economists ridicule this concern about the negative effects of the rising public debt on future economic growth. There is no way—so the argument goes—to shift the economic burden to future generations. You can only consume what has been produced. Under these circumstances, how can a nation live beyond its means? This argument is designed to appeal to simpletons. The basis for all economic growth, rising real per capita income, increased production and consumption, is the result of entrepreneurs investing their own and other people's funds in more and better tools, which permits a steady increase in man-hour productivity. Economic growth, and a rising standard of living, are ultimately dependent upon uninhibited capital accumulation.

Capital accumulation, however, is not an automatic process regulated by mother nature. To produce capital goods—factories and machinery—a corresponding amount of productive facilities must be released from other employment. It is not enough that technology and know-how is available to create new factories and modern machinery. Investors and businessmen must be willing to accumulate capital by doing the necessary investing. Furthermore, the creation of credit must not be confused with capital accumulation. People see idle factories and wonder why they cannot be used to produce the much-needed goods, with the aid of easier credit, if necessary. They fail to understand that the plants have become obsolete because adequate reserves were not set aside for depreciation and replacement. Or, if it is a new plant, people fail to understand that its construction in the first place was based on a miscalculation due to the false signal of easy credit. Rising costs have made a profitable operation impossible. People find it hard to see the thin edge of the wedge between capital accumulation and capital decumulation.

Capital decumulation, therefore, is the result of government action, such as the departure from the principle of fiscal policy. As the government creates more money and credit through deficit spending, prices and wages rise. Operating costs tend to rise faster than revenues, thus reducing profits. The result is idle factories and idle men. In short, the effect of deficit spending is more of the same condition that it was supposed to eliminate in the first place, Thus a vicious circle is put into place: deficit spending creates idle capacity and unemployment, when then call for more deficit spending, to create still more idle capacity and more unemployment.

Kick the Garbage Upstairs

There are those economists who suggest that the process of deficit spending can continue indefinitely. According to them, the public debt need never be repaid. It can go on growing indefinitely, as long as a stable relation between the debt and the gross national product is maintained. In the Ninth Pillar, we shall see why this is a fallacy. Here we may content ourselves with the observation that accumulating debt at the expense of accumulating capital is like dumping garbage in the attic. At one point, the attic is bound to give way, and all the garbage will come crashing down.

THE HUNGER TELECONFERENCE REPORT

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to my colleagues' attention an excellent report on the world hunger problem, the Executive Summary of the Hunger Teleconference Report. This report offers important information to Members of Congress who wish to better understand the hunger issue and draft legislation to alleviate this problem.

Mr. Speaker, I request that at this point in the RECORD the full text of the Executive Summary of the 1985 Hunger Teleconference Report be inserted:

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY OF THE 1985 HUNGER TELECONFERENCE REPORT

On World Food Day, October 16, over 200 colleges, universities and other institutions participated in the 1985 World Food Day Teleconference. A "North American Town Meeting" on food, hunger and agricultural issues, the three-hour event linked thousands of participants in the U.S. and Canada with a panel of international experts at the studios of George Washington University Television (GWTV) in Washington, DC. While the live, interactive sites were the primary teleconference audience, several million additional viewers saw the program on cable, Educational Television, The Learning Channel and Public Broadcasting Service (PBS) stations.

On the local level, the teleconference linked campus and community; on the national level, participants who might never meet face to face joined one another in a simultaneous exchange through the use of satellite technology to discuss policies and action against hunger. The event's most important results were the following: (1) Citizens from local communities participated in the formulation of local, national and international policies. (2) Participants' recommendations indicated that there is wide consensus on the elements of those policies.

The second annual WFD Teleconference was designed to give sites a hands-on experience in participatory democracy through interaction with local, national and international leaders. Expanding the scope and impact of a prototype teleconference, the sites' recommendations and questions to the panel included in the full Report continued the interaction. The full Report has been circulated to the expert panelists, the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), the U.S. Agency for International Development (AID), members of Congress and to the teleconference sites and other WFD planners in the U.S. and Canada.

Based on the local site reports, the on-air proceedings of the telecast and the panelists' written responses to summary questions, the Report is the final component in the 1985 WFD Teleconference Cycle. This Cycle, funded by AID through a Biden-Pell development education grant, included preparation of the background Study/Action Packet and the teleconference program itself, in addition to assisting local organizers in their plans for activities surrounding the teleconference.

BACKGROUND

World Food Day marks the anniversary of FAO and is observed worldwide to focus attention and action on international food security. 1985 was the 40th anniversary of FAO, the fifth World Food Day and the second WFD Teleconference.

In the U.S., the National Committee for World Food Day is comprised of over 350 member organizations including the major American food, farm, education, religious, nutrition, and relief and development organizations. The National Committee Office, a small resource center in Washington, DC, facilitates WFD planning in the U.S. The Office plays a unique role as a clearinghouse on food/farm/hunger issues by helping to disseminate the collective resoruces and expertise of member groups and local WFD planners to the public at large.

THE STUDY/ACTION PACKET

The WFD Study/Action Packet was compiled by the University of Illinois with assistance from a panel of hunger experts and academicians from 1984 teleconference sites. As an adaptable resource, the Packet contained fact sheets, annotated bibliographies and inserts from National Committee members, AID and the World Bank.

The Packet served as an aid to curriculum building on agricultural development, and as a backgrounder for the issues of WFD 1985. These included:

The relationship between poverty and hunger.

The impact of environmental degradation and resource depletion on food security.

The means to achieving long-term, sustainable agricultural development.

In addition to the teleconference sites, hundreds of other colleges nationwide received the Packet. Numerous community and professional groups as the USDA Extension Service also used this resource for information and training. Based on site reports, the Packet saw wide interdisciplinary use, and strengthened the role of the campus as a community resource center. At the University of Missouri-Columbia, for example, 800 copies of the document were reproduced and distributed to college departments ranging from English to Agriculture, as well as to Extension professionals throughout the state.

PLANNING THE TELECONFERENCE PROGRAM

Planning for the teleconference began in February 1985 and continued throughout the year with assistance from the National University Teleconference Network (NUTN), GWTV, PBS and others. The program format included: live presentations by four international experts in the first hour (one-way audio/one-way video); interruption of the broadcast in the middle hour to permit sites to conduct their own discussions, debates, etc.; return to the satellite broadcast in the third hour for an interactive question and answer period between the sites and panel (two-way audio/one-way video).

The teleconference program, hosted by TV/film star Eddie Albert, featured:

M. Peter McPherson, Administrator of AID.

Senator Paul Sarbanes (D-MD), member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Barbara Huddleston, Chief of the Food Security and Information Service of FAO.

Marie Savane, President of the Association of African Women for Research on Development in Dakar, Senegal.

Renee Poussaint (moderator), Emmy award-winning news anchorwoman of WJLA-TV, the ABC-TV affiliate in Washington.

LOCAL SITE PROGRAMS

Teleconference sites applied the event for their own institutional and community goals. However, they were encouraged to include local and domestic hunger issues in their mid-hour discussions, as these topics were not a primary focus of the national program. The range of activities at many sites required day-long, week-long, and even month-long programs. Several colleges reported plans to institutionalize WFD activities and curriculum building on a year-round basis.

The diversity of site programs received extensive coverage in the full Report, with particular emphasis on joint planning between campus and community groups to use the event as a community-wide resource; curriculum integration; involvement of off-campus groups; and local media outreach.

The WFD "North American Town Meeting" saw parallels at the local level; some site programs were individual town meetings involving mayors, state and national Representatives and other officials in discussion of local food issues, and several participating institutions broadcast their own mid-hour programs regionally, in at least one case with a local call-in. Sites emphasized the theme of "local-global links" in their activities, and sought to inform participants on similarities among local, domestic and international food issues.

The Teleconference Cycle made significant progress in assisting college faculty with interdisciplinary curriculum development. Although the teleconference remained a "special event" on campus, it was also a component of course work or an extra credit activity at most college sites. Beyond use of the teleconference and Packet as a pedagogic tool, the event provided many students with an opportunity to organize symposia, work with local media and establish contacts with local and national organizations—valuable educational experiences in themselves. In addition, many foreign students served as local panelists at their host institutions, sharing first-hand accounts of conditions and agricultural policies in their own countries.

Non-academic groups frequently provided local program panelists, discussion leaders, and participants to the sites, who responded generously with fundraisers, hunger walks, food drives, and other activities in support of domestic and international hunger organizations. Through off-campus participation and the caliber of local program activities, the teleconference sites themselves ensured wide media coverage of the event, and worked with local stations to carry excerpts of the national program. Many sites invited local television journalists to serve as their mid-hour program moderators, increasing local coverage.

PROGRAM SUMMARY

After a brief introduction by Eddie Albert, the national broadcast began with a videotaped message from the Director-General of FAO, Edouard Saouma, who encouraged participants to renew their efforts against hunger, whether as governments, non-governmental organizations or individuals. Then, throughout the first hour, the moderator questioned each panelist, and invited them to express disagreement with one another or to expand upon points being raised. The following is a summary of the discussion:

M. Peter McPherson: a description of U.S. emergency assistance to Africa in the past year, and ongoing AID development programs undertaken in the Third World with assistance from the Private Voluntary Organizations. Mr. McPherson explained a policy error common in many developing countries of providing cheap food to politicized and potentially volatile urban populations at the expense of poor farmers in the countryside. He emphasized the importance of producer incentives, and the role of AID in providing intermediate-term support to countries undergoing a transition in policy towards pricing reforms. Regarding American public opinion on continuing foreign asssistance during a period of domestic cut-backs, Mr. McPherson stated that the U.S. Government and AID must be more aggressive in promoting foreign assistance as something the American public can buy into, but that African governments must also assume more responsibility for their future.

Paul Sarbanes: a summary of Congressional action on foreign assistance, particularly to Africa, and discussion of the important role of the American public in influencing policy on both domestic and international hunger. Sen. Sarbanes made note of the fact that many problems confronting the American farmer are not due to development programs abroad, but to causes such as the overvalued dollar and competition from other developed countries. Instead, he pointed out that international development has been proven to increase foreign markets for American goods, including foodstuffs, because as countries develop, they are able to finance imports. Mr. Sarbanes also discussed the role of multilateral agencies such as FAO in finding joint solutions to international hunger and agricultural crises, and encouraged participants to observe World Food Day as one means of involving citizens in this process.

Barbara Huddleston: discussion of the importance of policy formulation to ensure proper production, marketing, transport and distribution of food within developing countries. Ms. Huddleston reminded participants of competing interests within all nations, and the difficulty of Third World governments to reconcile these interests within their own often fragile democracies. She explained that in many cases, policies held over from colonial times still direct these young governments, without sufficient flexibility by donors to help beneficiaries undergo the necessary adjustment process. Ms. Huddleston stated that from the standpoint of FAO, more belt-tightening must occur at all levels to make sure that development assistance gets "more mileage for the buck."

Marie Savane: discussion of the fame and conditions in Africa from the African perspective, including observations on often unsuccessful policies and methodologies imposed on beneficiary governments by donors. Mme. Savane was particularly concerned about the Western propensity to "compartmentalize" approaches to development, rather than involving beneficiaries themselves in a wider range of needs assessment and program design, implementation and evaluation. She also discussed the impact of the famine in compelling both Africans and Westerns to recognize global interdependence, and to improve long-range planning. Mme. Savane acknowledged that mismanagement has been a problem in Africa, but that African governments are making positive changes.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR ACTION

Teleconference sites were asked to share recommendations for action in the following areas: U.S. Government, International Community, Food Crisis Governments, Colleges and Universities and Local Community Action. The following themes recurred:

Criticism of military spending over support for hunger-related programs.

Criticism of politicized aid/development programs and use of food as a "weapon."

The need for increased education and training.

The need for improved food distribution.

The efficiency of small farmers, and the need for technologically and culturally appropriate agricultural programs.

As in 1984, sites charged the U.S. with setting an international example against hunger, but this year, they were much more outspoken in addressing domestic hunger, as well. Sites criticized U.S. Government policies of military expenditures rather than support for domestic and international agriculture and development programs, and condemned politicization of food aid. They voiced strong support for American farmers, and urged the Government to prevent the further demise of the American family farm. Finally, sites urged policy-makers in the U.S. to reorient their planning to the long-term, placing greater emphasis on education and training in development programs more sensitive to appropriate technologies and cultural norms.

Regarding the International Community, the major concern of sites was improved cooperative efforts. Recommendations called for more support of, and involvement in, multilateral agencies by the nations of the world and for a more equitable distribution of resources within the international community. Sites also suggested that a clearinghouse of international proportions be established to coordinate and disseminate agricultural technologies. Other suggestions entailed upgrading international oversight of emergency food distribution and the establishment of international reserves.

For Food Crisis Governments, sites urged the adoption of "food first" policies and a reevaluation of export cropping in nations faced with domestic food shortages. These governments should, in the view of teleconference participants, assume greater responsibility for their own future, and were repeatedly criticized for allowing military/strategic considerations to predominate over feeding their starving populations. Thus, improved distribution of both domestically produced and donated foods was a major theme in this recommendations category, with related discussion of the need to upgrade infrastructure for storing and transporting food in assistance with donors.

Colleges and Universities received the most recommendations, including calls for increased overseas experiences for students and faculty; more appropriate research, greater involvement in local domestic food issues; and the responsibility of higher education to emphasize global interdependence. Many sites indicated that as a result of World Food Day planning, they are already beginning to implement these strategies.

Recommendations for local community action included the following suggestions: increased awareness and involvement; establish links among local/national/international hunger issues; coordinate local action to prevent redundancy of efforts; decrease consumption and waste, and support local food banks; and exercise democratic rights to influence food and hunger policies through correspondence with legislators and policymakers and judicious use of the vote. Again in this category, and often as a result of campus-community contacts through the teleconference, many respondents stated that these recommendations are already guiding their local outreach activities.

THE MEDICAID INFANT MORTALITY AMENDMENTS OF 1986

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Medicaid Infant Mortality Amendments of 1986. I feel strongly that this bill will help to alleviate the tragedy of infant mortality in this prosperous Nation. The Congress is long overdue in taking on this challenge of rising infant mortality rates with the necessary and deliberate action that it deserves. Now is the time for us to act, as a body, on our commitment to the survival of our children.

Infant mortality rates are commonly used as indicators of a population's health status. Overall infant mortality rates in this country are on the decline. Since 1981, however, the decline is slowing and we are in fact able to note a rise in post-neonatal mortality. From 1982 to 1983 the rate of infant death rose by 3 percent, and again by 6 percent in 1984. The Children's Defense Fund, a widely accepted authority on the problem, estimates that rates rose about 9 percent in 1985. Obviously the problem is growing at a phenomenal rate. Our immediate attention to this matter must be mandated by our moral sense as well as our responsibility to our constituents.

For black Americans the reality of infant death is even more devastating. Infant mortality rates for blacks are twice as high as those of whites, and blacks are twice as likely to produce low birth weight babies. Low birth weight accounts for two-thirds of all infant deaths.

Too many women today are facing the hardship of bearing children in the context of unretractable poverty. Women aged 18 to 24 give birth to some 40 percent of all babies born in the United States in a given year. Yet, in 1984, more than 25 percent of these women had no private health insurance or public health coverage such as Medicaid or Medicare. This statistic is particularly disturbing because a high percentage of working women aged 18 to 24 earn less than $10,000 annually. This group of working poor women are simply unable to afford the cost of prenatal care and delivery, especially if they must meet that cost in the absence of public health coverage.

The Health Insurance Association of America estimates that the cost for an uncomplicated pregnancy is at least $5,000, while Federal programs such as Medicaid cover only about 43 percent of women of reproductive age who earn less than $5,000 per year. In all States, Medicaid is tied closely to AFDC payment levels and most payment levels are set at less than 50 percent of the Federal poverty level. In Texas, AFDC payment levels are at 27 percent of the Federal poverty level; this means that presently, only those Texas women with incomes no greater than 27 percent of the poverty level are eligible to receive maternity care at the expense of Medicaid. Those who have incomes which are 28 percent of the poverty level must find their own ways to pay for needed care. As you might imagine, these women simply do without needed care and consequently, many do not give birth to healthy babies.

Currently, Medicaid offers no coverage for postpartum care of complications during pregnancy, in spite of the fact that in more than 56 percent of all pregnancies there is at least one complication. Few States even cover diagnostic services and screening so necessary in cases of suspected high risk. Furthermore, reimbursement policy under Medicaid makes it difficult for covered women to find good health-care providers. Poor women, most likely to lack any insurance coverage, public or private, are faced with an enormous dilemma.

Some of us may argue that infant mortality is a problem, but that we have not yet determined the best way to combat it. But the evidence suggests and the medical community agrees, that the upward trend in infant mortality can be curbed with increased access to prenatal care for pregnant women. This reality is unavoidable. However, receiving this care means having the ability to pay for services. Lack of maternity care, frequently a result of poverty, is the greatest contributor to infant death in this country.

The purpose of the Infant Mortality Reduction Amendments of 1986, is to allow States to exercise an option to provide prenatal care, delivery, and post-partum care to women who survive at or below 100 percent of the Federal poverty level. The bill also provides well-child care for the infant involved up to 1 year of age, without regard to State income eligibility thresholds. This bill also allows States to target Medicaid dollars on care for high-risk pregnant women and infants without regard to family structure and without regard to cash assistance the family may already be receiving under the AFDC Program. This is the logical next step in reforming Medicaid eligibility policy so that Federal funds are invested where they will save the most lives and the most money.

Another admirable quality of this bill is that it is cost-effective, and in the long run will save the Government millions of dollars. The cost of providing the services authorized under this legislation, approximately $125 million for the first year, is far less than the cost of maintaining babies who are born sick and underweight. Poor nutrition and little, late or no prenatal care is typical of the mothers of these children and contributes significantly to the problem. And I might add that this lack of proper nutrition and prenatal care is a direct result of poverty.

Sick and underweight newborns are extremely costly because they require extended hospital stays and continued medical services outside of the hospital, in order to maintain the fragile life. Presently, hospitals have to absorb the costs of care for uninsured mothers and babies. If the baby is sick the cost can be astronomical. The Allan Guttmacher Institute has determined that newborns who are sick and underweight can require massive and expensive treatment, and they account for 27 percent of all uncompensated costs to hospitals. In fact, almost half of all unpaid hospital bills of $25,000 and more, are the result of caring for sick newborns. This a growing problem, especially among public and teaching hospitals which invariably shoulder much of the burden.

This is a problem of national significance. The problem is widespread in this country and affects every State, but impacts most heavily in the poorer Southern and Southwestern States. It is our moral obligation to stop the backward trend that less enlightened policy has created in the American health-care system. The administration has been extremely instrumental in ignoring these frightening trends, diverting attention instead to budget deficits and rising health care costs. By providing access to early prenatal care, we can not only save money, but we can also reduce the incidence of morbidity and mortality among America's children.

For many years I have worked to reduce the suffering of people who live in poverty. The Southern Governors' Association Task Force on Infant Mortality, chaired by Governor Riley of South Carolina, and the National Governors' Association as well as the Children's Defense Fund have worked diligently with the subcommittee staff to come up with a remedy for some of the short-comings in the Nation's welfare system. And I firmly believe the Medicaid Infant Mortality Amendments of 1986 is a good first step in the right direction.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, each year, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States and its Ladies Auxiliary conduct the Voice of Democracy essay-writing contests. This year more than 250,000 secondary school students competed for six national scholarship prizes. While each participant can be commended for his effort, I would like to bring your attention to one particular script.

The winning script for the State of Minnesota was written by Mr. Robert Carlson of Duluth. Robert is in the 11th grade at Duluth Cathedral High School and hopes to pursue a career in either writing or photography. As the youngest of eight children, it is obvious from Robert's essay that his parents, Charles and Gene Carlson, instilled tremendous virtues of patriotism in their children. I am proud of Robert's accomplishments as I am certain his entire family is.

I want to share "New Horizons for America's Youth" with my colleagues. I urge each Member of Congress to read it, and I hope you will remember the young author's message that the American democracy must be protected and built upon for future generations to enjoy.

The article follows:

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

On the fourth day of July, in the year seventeen hundred and seventy-six, the founding fathers of America shocked and amazed the world with their historic document, the Declaration of Independence. Never before had any group of people so emphatically expressed their need to break away from a government that failed to support the fundamental rights and freedoms of its citizens. Every one of the men who signed the Declaration knew that by doing so he was putting his life in great jeopardy. King George of England had already ruthlessly put down protests of the stamp and tea taxes, and it seemed certain that he would respond to the Declaration of Independence in the same manner. The valor of the original signers in the face of such danger can best be seen in the courage of just one man, Johnathan Hancock. Knowing that his cause was right, Hancock did not care if the whole world was against him in his efforts to gain liberty. In expression of his dedication to his belief in freedom, he boldly penned what has become the most well known signature in the world today. It is fitting that we hold Hancock in as much esteem as we do; he stands as a reminder of our country's original patriotic courage, and of our bold defiance of injustice and oppression. The sculptors of our nation were not afraid to take risks, no matter how enormous, for they were truly guided by the maxim, "One man, in harmony with God, is a majority". With that in mind, how can anyone compromise his values and not stand up for what he knows is right? Those first patriots who gave their lives to win the freedom of this land would never have done so and we, as the youth of America and trustees of our country's future, must never do so either.

Nothing can weaken a nation more effectively than the apathy of its citizens. At one time, the mighty Roman Empire commanded the tribute and respect of all the civilizations that were then known. Rome encompassed all the best ideas and discoveries of the world and molded them together into one great nation—a nation that many people thought would last forever. But it didn't. The Roman people became overconfident, overindulgent, apathetic. And as the people of Rome weakened, so did the structure and might of the Roman Empire itself. The army that had once been the most powerful force on earth began to lose battles . . . the Italian peninsula was invaded . . . the Empire crumbled. The ruins of the Colosseum stand as a silent witness to the fate of a great nation whose people failed to care enough about it to preserve its ideals.

Many years into the future, will people look back upon America as we now look back upon the Roman Empire, and say what a shame it is that such a great civilization ever had to fall from glory? Nowhere else in the world do the citizens of a land have as many opportunities to participate in the democratic process as we do here in America—and nowhere else in the world would it be more tragic for such freedoms to be left unused. Past generations have faithfully preserved the ideals of democracy in our country, but soon it will be time for the torch to be passed down, and the youth of America will be given their chance to prove themselves equal to the spirit of the founding fathers. We are at the threshold of a great decision; in the distance can be seen the horizon of our future. With it come new challenges, new problems, and new goals that even the founding fathers could never have foreseen. Just beyond the horizon, there is a sun, the most brilliant sun that ever shined. Whether that sun is rising or setting upon America depends entirely upon our efforts. If we truly want it, and if we truly work for it, America can outshine even the hopes and dreams of our nation's founders.

THE CALIFORNIA COAST MUST BE PRESERVED FROM OFFSHORE DRILLING

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, once again we are facing a concerted effort by the oil industry and its allies at the Department of the Interior to open up the magnificent California coast to offshore drilling. The new draft leasing program put forth by the Interior Department opens up vast stretches of our fragile coast—despite the fact that an overwhelming majority of the people in our coastal communities strongly object to this policy.

Today, at a hearing of the Interior Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, I requested that the moratorium on offshore leasing along the California coast be imposed again. Mr. Speaker, I would like to place the testimony I presented to the committee in the RECORD. This is an important issue and my colleagues will hear more about it in the upcoming weeks:

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE TOM LANTOS

Mr. Chairman, I regret that I must appear before you today to urge action again on the controversial issue of drilling off the California coast. Your subcommittee—and you personally, Mr. Chairman—have been most supportive in the past of the legitimate concerns of Californians to protect the unparalleled natural beauty of our magnificent coast from uncontrolled exploitation through oil and gas drilling.

Mr. Chairman, today I most emphatically and urgently request that you again impose a moratorium on oil and gas leasing by the Department of Interior along the California coast. In submitting this request, I know that you are already familiar with my reasons for opposing uncontrolled OCS leasing. Today, however, I would like to acquaint you with the recurrent problems experienced by the California congressional delegation as we have attempted to reach a negotiated solution with the Administration.

When Secretary Watt set about carving up the coastline with a recklessness that could not be curbed, talks were rejected and we resorted to moratoria to protect the coast. That recklessness, it now transpires, cost the government several billion dollars. As you are aware, a recent report from the General Accounting Office states that in Secretary Watt's headlong rush to auction off coastal waters, he sold the leases at bargain prices.

Last year, members of the California congressional delegation and Interior Secretary Donald P. Hodel entered into what we considered to be good-faith negotiations to meet both the needs of the oil industry and environmental concerns. After extensive discussions, we reached a historic agreement that satisfied the concerns to protect certain areas of the coast, but at the same time permitted limited drilling in less sensitive areas. At a public press conference last July, Secretary Hodel stated "I am pleased that our intensive good faith efforts to negotiate with the States on this difficult issue have created the environment in which the Congress has now acted fairly and equitably."

I regret to say, however, that Secretary Watt went back on his word. While we held fast to our side of the bargain, the Secretary has claimed that our agreement is no longer valid.

Although I and many of my colleagues questioned how we could continue to negotiate with an Administration that had so clearly compromised its integrity, we continued—and indeed are still attempting—to reach an agreement following the new leasing proposals released earlier this year. The Department of the Interior, however, has consistently failed to negotiate in good faith. No agreement has been reached and none appears likely.

Time is running out. While making no serious effort to negotiate with the Congress, the Interior Department has issued a new draft leasing program which opens to leasing many sensitive areas of the California coast.

Mr. Chairman, the situation has assumed unprecedented gravity. We are engaged in negotiations with a Secretary who will not negotiate; the Administration is determined to push through its leasing plans in the face of clear opposition from virtually every coastal community in California. We are not engaged in an equal fight—the odds are stacked against us by an Administration that is clearly ignoring the wishes of the people most directly involved. The only way to insure serious negotiations with the Department is to reimpose a one-year moratorium. I respectfully request your support.

MARKET ACCESS PROBLEMS WITH REPUBLIC OF KOREA

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, business and Government leaders have recently been engaged in discussions designed to ease some of the market access problems we have with the Republic of Korea. I am pleased that the Koreans are willing to discuss our concerns before they become major ones, and have cooperated with our Government in solving the 301 unfair trade practice eases.

There has been a lot of talk about the likelihood of Korea becoming the next Japan as far as a potential closed market for U.S. exports and an aggressive export policy are concerned. While it is true that Korea, as a developing country, has restricted its home market to imports to encourage local industries, there does seem to be an awareness that it must start playing by the same rules as industrialized nations as a major exporter.

It is my hope that Korea will be less interested in achieving industrial self-sufficiency, and home market protection than some of its neighbors. Progress has been made recently and I believe that prospects are better for U.S. exporters. I do not expect that Korea will become "the next Japan," because it is not in its interest to do so. Certainly, the United States, its largest market, will not tolerate such conduct.

The history of the long, close relationship between the United States and Korea gives me hope that the bilateral discussions will continue to show progress in easing some of the market access problems we now have with Korea.

AN EDITORIAL VIEWPOINT

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a recent editorial that appeared in the Omaha World Herald on the American attack on Libyan military installations.

The article brilliantly points out that in an age of cultural tolerance, we cannot allow a desert dictator to attack our culture and civilization with violent impunity. Defending ourselves was as the World Herald said, "a moral imperative." I ask permission to have the text of the editorial reprinted in full.

Also, Mr. Speaker, the European Community is engaged in an elaborate con game. Menacing threats of EC retaliation, should the United States restrict several products of importance to the Community, have become standard fare. Yes, it is true that we are considering trade sanctions on several of their products. But this is not some unilateral action on our part.

It is in retaliation for their longstanding practice of agricultural subsidies and for their recent, blatant attempt to use Spanish/Portuguese accession to the Common Market to restrict our sales even further. It is not they, but we, who are the aggrieved party. A recent World Herald editorial, which I commend to my colleagues, put the issue in correct perspective when it urged that we give the European Community a taste of its own medicine.

Again, I request permission to have the text of this editorial reprinted in the RECORD:

THE ACTION AGAINST LIBYA IN STEP WITH U.S. HERITAGE

In circles where appeasement is considered chic, the U.S. bombing attacks against military targets near Tripoli and Benghazi are receiving the predictable condemnation. The truth is, however, that the United States has few practical alternatives except to respond to Libyan-sponsored terrorist attacks with limited force.

Negotiations, the 1980s cure-all, would be inappropriate. The behavior of Libyan leader Moammar Khadafy reflects a fanatic's hatred for the United States—and Western civilization in general—that leaves no room for considering him to be a potentially reliable partner in diplomacy. Khadafy has expansionist goals in northern Africa and a commitment to the destruction of Israel, neither of which is a negotiable item. Finally, the United States has a policy of refusing to negotiate with terrorists.

Support for economic and political isolation of Khadafy has been lacking among the nation's European allies. The European Common Market this week seemed to be striving to distance itself from the fray when it adopted a resolution urging "restraint on both sides"—as if it were intellectually possible to take a neutral position between terrorism and anti-terrorism. France even refused to let American warplanes enter French airspace during their Britain-to-Libya flight.

The potential costs of turning the other cheek are unacceptably high. To let terrorism go unchallenged is to condone it. Western Europe might prefer not to confront the problem on Libya sponsored violence, but no evidence suggests that ignoring Khadafy's activities would lead to less terrorism.

Bombing Libya, to be sure, carries a risk for the United States. Nobody wants a general war. European nations that are friendly to the United States have property and people in Libya. The Soviet Union maintains technicians and equipment there. Moderate Arab nations, while wary of Khadafy, often tend to view the confrontation from a Third World perspective. Finally, Khadafy's potential reactions are difficult to predict.

The United States has reduced the risks, however, with its careful selection of targets, its efforts to keep other nations informed and the documentation it has provided for its actions. Evidence linking Libya with the bombing of a West Berlin nightclub in which an American serviceman died strengthened the case for action. So did evidence indicating that Libya had planned to massacre people waiting outside the American consulate in Paris to obtain visas.

The United States can do no less for people such as 11-year-old Natasha Simpson, who was one of the victims gunned down in the Rome airport last December, or 8-month-old Demetra Klug, who fell to her death with her mother and grandmother after a terrorist's bomb blasted a hole in the side of their plane.

Taking a stand against international terrorism is a moral imperative for any nation that is dedicated to freedom and human dignity. The refusal to be intimidated by tyrants and international thugs is an inseparable part of the American character dating from the earliest days of the republic. To continue to sit by while Khadafy runs unchallenged would be contradictory to the kind of nation America has been—and the kind it ought to be.

A TRADE THREAT FROM EUROPE

Ella Krucoff, a representative of the European Economic Community, made it sound as if she believes that the EEC, or Common Market, is about to become an innocent victim of a trade war. If the United States imposes certain trade sanctions, she said, "It is likely that the EEC will be ready to respond in kind."

But the Common Market has used subsidies, tariffs and other protectionist measures for years. Its protectionist policies, particularly in agriculture, are the reason that the United States is considering taking action in an attempt to restore free trade.

Each year, the Common Market fixes prices above market levels for European farm products. The high prices encourage European farmers to overproduce. The surplus grain is dumped on the international market at prices below the cost of production. The policies cost the Common Market about $4.6 billion in 1985.

The European subsidies hurt American farmers. While Common Market food exports have increased in recent years, U.S. agricultural exports have declined from $43.8 billion in 1981 to an estimated $28 billion this year.

American efforts to complete without resorting to protectionist measures have been unsuccessful. The Reagan administration recently suggested that it might be ready to give the Common Market a taste of its own medicine. The United States said it will place quotas and tariffs on products such as European wine, canned hams, cookies and olives unless the Common Market reduces its agricultural subsidies.

The American commitment to free trade shouldn't be abandoned, even temporarily, without serious provocation. But U.S. trade officials have a point when they say that free trade is unlikely to occur with Common Market policies as they are. The decision to give the Common Market additional perspective on protectionism could, if Europe reacts the way Washington hopes it will, lead to a more reasonable trading relationship.

HAZARDOUS MATERIALS TRANSPORTATION SAFETY AMENDMENTS OF 1986

HON. CARDISS COLLINS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to joint with Mr. WIRTH in cosponsoring the Hazardous Materials Transportation Safety Amendments of 1986. The importance of the legislation is clear to those who understand the challenges facing us in the transportation of hazardous materials today.

Our bill would:

Unify the motor vehicle transportation safety agencies within the Department of Transportation;

Commit additional resources and staffing to Federal truck safety enforcement;

Require the registration of hazardous material shippers;

Improve Federal standards for training drivers, dockworkers, police, and firemen;

Create a special State drivers license for drivers of chemical and other highly hazardous cargo; and Require the designation of truck routes for the safest movement of dangerous loads.

Much care has been taken to craft this bill. Let me elaborate on a few of its provisions for a moment.

In 1974, Congress passed the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act. This act was a beginning. Since then, regulations have multiplied to cover all aspects of moving dangerous cargoes. All aspects, that is, except the most important, the human elements. We have regulations on containerization, placarding, equipment, and shipping papers, but regulation covering driver qualifications is vague. Regulations addressing the baseline level of knowledge for dockworkers, loaders, packers, and others associated with the processes of interstate commerce, are so weak as to be unenforceable.

I have three recent studies to support my contention. First, the Congressional Research Service reported in an April 4, 1986, study that 65 percent of all hazardous materials transportation accidents were caused by human failure, not package failure, vehicle accidents, or equipment malfunction. CRS's study evaluated DOT regulations and concluded that DOT trucking regulations for dockworkers, warehousemen, and shipping workers are inadequate and have an adverse impact on safe transportation.

A second study is a recent analysis performed for the Federal Highway Administration. The Mandex, Inc., consulting firm reported that 67 percent of all reported truck accidents in 1983 were preventable and 94.5 percent of those accidents were caused by driver failures. Again, this is the human element to which I referred.

The last study is an Office of Technology Assessment report which will be published shortly. It reports that 75 percent of all emergency first-responders such as police, firemen, and first-aid crews, do not have basic training for responding to hazardous materials transportation accidents. This astonishing figure represents the weak link in our Nation's protection of public safety.

The three studies to which I have just referred confirm what my subcommittee's investigative study had discovered earlier: We haven't put a significant amount of attention to the human side of the safety equation. The legislation I am cosponsoring today addresses this issue in three ways: higher licensing requirements for high-level hazard drivers, incentive funding for emergency responder training and improved regulations for worker safety training. These are commonsense provisions.

Mr. Speaker, by emphasizing improved training standards, I don't mean to downplay other provisions of our bill. Shipper registration, mandated in our bill, is long overdue. Improved routing of dangerous cargo, publication of DOT carrier safety ratings, and unification of truck safety enforcement within DOT, all these provisions are also badly needed and widely supported by industry and labor.

Mr. Speaker, I urge speedy consideration of this bill.

IN RECOGNITION OF DAVID LAWRENCE, JR.

HON. DENNIS M. HERTEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this past Tuesday, Mr. David Lawrence, Jr., was honored with the Human Rights Award of the American Jewish Committee's Institute of Human Rights.

Mr. Lawrence is well known to people across the country through past accomplishments, and particularly to us in Detroit for his work at the Detroit Free Press. Recently, he has begun his own weekly column which helps put into perspective the events of the previous week. It enables him to communicate with the public and stay in touch with the problems of the community.

Mr. Lawrence began his career in journalism in 1963 with the St. Petersburg Times. He subsequently worked with the Washington Post, the Palm Beach Post, the Philadelphia Daily News, and was editor of the Charlotte Observer. In 1978 he joined the Detroit Free Press as executive editor, and last year became publisher and chairman of this fine publication.

David Lawrence's illustrious career is complemented by an admirable record of public service.

He is a director of the American Society of Newspaper Editors and serves as chair of its Credibility Committee. He is also director of the Journalism Institute for Minorities at Wayne State University and is a member of the board of directors of Detroit Renaissance, the Greater Detroit Chamber of Commerce, the United Foundation, the Michigan Council for the Arts, the Economic Club of Detroit, and the Michigan Thanksgiving Parade Foundation.

In addition, he is on the advisory committee of the Institute for Journalism Education, and is a trustee of the Foundation for American Communications, the Detroit Institute for Children, Grosse Pointe Academy, Children's Hospital, and is on the board of trustees of the Founders Society/Detroit Institute of Arts.

This incredible list is only the tangible product of David Lawrence's dedication to his cause. The fact that Mr. Lawrence, a Roman Catholic, is receiving this award illustrates his successful attempts at bridging the cross-cultural roadblocks that are often factors in the fight against repression of the human spirit.

In these times of international and intercultural friction, David Lawrence has emerged as a concerned human being who truly cares about human rights. He inspires us all to follow his lead and I ask that my colleagues join me in commending David Lawrence and encourage him to continue his pursuit of these high ideals.

SOVIET JEWRY

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to express my continuing outrage about the Soviet authorities gross mistreatment of the Jewish community within the U.S.S.R. The persecution of Soviet Jews is pervasive, systematic and insidious. Having been to the Soviet Union some five times, I am very familiar with the hardships endured by the Soviet Jewish community. Throughout my travels I was able to meet with both Jewish and Christian refusniks in Moscow, Lenigrad and Kiev. The very fact that I even met with these individuals earned me the dubious distinction of "Congressman Dracula"—a comment made by the official communist propaganda organ, Tass. My heart goes out to these courageous people.

Mr. Speaker, most of us agree that the Soviet state is physically strong but morally corrupt. Evidence of this is manifested by the fact that the Soviet Union is a nation which denies blatant anti-Semitism yet continues to implement a harsh policy of state-sponsored intimidation of Jews—a community whose only crime is desire to pursue conscientiously their religion. Given these circumstances, it is no wonder that the world fears the Soviet Union—a nation whose legal system is respected no further than its reach.

Most of us are aware that once a Jewish family applies for an exit visa, one hardship after another predictably follows. Throughout the years the Jewish community in the Soviet Union has courageously confronted rampant anti-Semitism with little hope of ever living freely. The Soviet Jews are the only national group in the Soviet Union which systematically suffers from mass humiliation, the only one whose national language—Hebrew—is forbidden: whose history, religion, national identity are effectively silenced. Reminiscent of the Nazi persecution of the Jews under Hitler, the Jews in the Soviet Union must be identified as Jewish on their identification cards, and are regularly excluded jobs of significant responsibility.

As Moscow continues its campaign to deprive Jews of their past, and their links with Jews throughout the world, a flood of anti-Semitic and racist propaganda has inundated every corner of the Soviet Union. Seeds of hate and distrust have been cultivated by authorities via the press and media. Anti-Semitism continues to be thinly masked as anti-Zionism, and remains directed against Judaism. Never-the-less anti-Semitic articles, books, and phamplets have invaded nearly all segments of Soviet society.

Their courage of Jewish refusniks in the Soviet Union in the face of despair: their determination in the face of fear, their hope in the face of punishment must compel us to demonstrate our solidarity with them until every Jew who wants to leave the Soviet Union can emigrate freely. We cannot remain silent, nor do we have the right to remain silent. Organizations such as the National Council of Jewish Women is characteristic of international human rights and support groups who will not let this issue die. Through the efforts of many organizations like the National Council, over 275,000 Jews have been able to leave the U.S.S.R.

The fact that pressure has been successfully brought to bear on the Soviets tells us that Russia is not totally impervious to international opinion. For this reason we should be spurred to action now, more than ever. Soviet officials would no doubt prefer to that we forget the refusniks, to become discouraged and to ignore the issue. This would plunge Soviet Jewry into immobilizing darkness and the Soviets would then be completely undeterred in their objectives of cultural genocide. These modern Jewish refusniks are heroes who deserve more than a policy of benign neglect. If we do not remember them, fight for them, and rally for them, who will?

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that American interests are best served by ensuring the protection of human rights of people currently living under authoritarian and totalitarian governments. To achieve this goal a internationally coordinated, and strategic approach to human rights is absolutely critical to its effectiveness. Toward this end, I would like to recognize and commend the efforts of the National Council of Jewish Women—an organization committed to this approach.

FORMER DEFENSE SECRETARY HAROLD BROWN SAYS SALT AGREEMENTS SHOULD BE PRESERVED

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, on April 15, 1986, the Subcommittee on Arms Control, International Security and Science conducted an important hearing on "The Implications of Abandoning SALT." The purpose of the hearing was to examine the current debate in the administration on whether to continue complying with the SALT agreements.

Of particular note were the comments made by Dr. Harold Brown, the former Secretary of Defense. Dr. Brown informed the members of the subcommittee that it would be in the best interests of the United States to continue abiding by the SALT agreements.

Among the several options being considered by the administration at this time is the drydocking rather than dismantling of two Poseidon submarines, an action that would put the United States over the SALT numerical limit for MIRV'd, ICBM's and SLBM's. Responding to the drydocking of the submarines, Secretary Brown said that such a move would be detrimental to United States interests since the Soviets are currently better positioned to exploit a "breakout" of the treaty. He said the Soviets have more "hot production" lines for strategic weapons than the United States, more heavy missiles ready to take thousands of additional warheads, and no Gramm-Rudman.

The Secretary said undercutting SALT will also:

Undercut the survivability of two of the three components of the U.S. strategic triad—land-based ICBM's and bombers.

Enable the Soviets to deploy 500 more launchers and approximately 4,000 more warheads.

Fail to constrain Soviet modernization efforts.

Make the Midgetman missile less survivable.

Have a chilling effect on the Geneva arms talks.

And place the onus of blame for the demise of SALT on the United States.

While describing Soviet noncompliance as "troubling" but of marginal military importance, Secretary Brown argues that the United States should not respond "proportionately" but instead "effectively" to Soviet noncompliance. The drydocking of two Poseidon submarines, Brown said, would by no means constitute an effective response. Secretary Brown said he favored moving more quickly on the Midgetman ICBM as part of an effective response rather than taking any action at this time that would breach the treaty limits.

Mr. Speaker, Secretary Brown has succinctly outlined in his testimony why it would be fundamentally contrary to our interests to undercut SALT at this time. I hope that all the President's arms control advisers will find the time to reflect on Secretary Brown's reasoned explanation before making a decision that could possibly determine the path arms control will follow for the remainder of this century.

DuPAGE COUNTY SUPPORTS TERMINATION OF REVENUE SHARING

HON. HARRIS W. FAWELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. FAWELL. Mr. Speaker, I recently received a letter from the DuPage County board chairman, Jack Knuepfer, regarding the General Revenue Sharing Program.

Jack Knuepfer's letter was most welcomed because it expressed the DuPage County government's support for allowing the Revenue Sharing Program to terminate. In fact, DuPage County has planned its budget for next year under the assumption that these funds will not be available.

At a time when most of us are being swamped with correspondence in support of the program's continuation, DuPage County has taken a position on the program with which I identify: if the Federal Government had the revenue to share, the program should be continued. Otherwise, it makes little sense to send borrowed Federal dollars to State and local governments operating with surpluses.

Jack Knuepfer's letter follows:

DUPAGE COUNTY,
April 3, 1986.

Hon. HARRIS FAWELL,
U.S. Representative,
Washington, DC.

DEAR HARRIS: This is the time of year when the National Association of Counties urges us to write you in support of revenue sharing. If you had revenue to share, we would be asking you to do it. Since there is only a deficit at the Federal level, we are not eager to share that.

Again this year DuPage County takes the position that the fiscal solvency of the Federal government is more important than any program or revenue source we can think of. We urge you not to continue our subsidies, but rather to continue your efforts to balance the budget.

Sincerely yours,

JACK T. KNUEPFER,
County Board Chairman.

WINNERS OF 1986 WESTCHESTER VOLUNTEER OF THE YEAR AWARD

HON. JOSEPH J. DioGUARDI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. DioGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, one of the facets of American culture that makes this Nation the best and most caring on Earth is our endless spirit of volunteerism. Throughout our Nation's history, millions of people have given their time, energy, and individual talents to help better the lives of others.

Individuals, churches, businesses, schools, and other organizations have made special contributions to this spirit. Sponsoring activities and other initiatives to promote the welfare of the whole community is to be commended. All too often, many people are unwilling to participate in philanthropic endeavors unless there exists some form of material benefit. This is unfortunate because the sense of helping others and knowing that you have made a contribution to the betterment of society is the greatest award any individual can achieve.

The spirit of volunteerism is especially important today. At a time when we see the Federal Government moving away from many social responsibilities and placing these tasks upon the private sector and the American people, we must make every effort to promote individual initiative on the behalf of others.

Again this year, the Volunteer Services Bureau of Westchester, Inc., an organization which has an outstanding record of community service, honors those individuals and groups that have displayed extraordinary dedication and commitment to the volunteer spirit.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to recognize those special winners of the 1986 Westchester Volunteer of the Year Awards. They are:

Volunteer of the Year, Mrs. Betsy June Bennett;

Group Award, Respite Care Co-op;

Student Award, Jennie Pidel;

R.S.V.P. Award, Mrs. Dorothy Garber;

Corporate Award, "St-Att-Us" Volunteers; and Agency Award, Children's Village.

I submit for inclusion in the RECORD, statements which detail the accomplishments of these groups and individuals.

1986 WESTCHESTER VOLUNTEER OF THE YEAR

Mrs. Betsy June Bennett was chosen as the 1986 Westchester Volunteer of the Year because of her dedicated service for many agencies in Yonkers and, in particular, her efforts toward the revitalization of abandoned properties for lower income families.

Although Betsy is a full-time employee at Ciba-Geigy, she is reliable, flexible, and multitalented in her volunteer services. Betsy has been involved in numerous volunteer activities in the Yonkers community such as the Salvation Army South Yonkers Youth Council, Y.W.C.A., Yonkers Employment for Seniors, Bryn Mawr Park Presbyterian Church and its Caring Committee. Mrs. Bennett's commitment and indispensability grew during the S.W.A.P. project. She took part in all the tasks necessary to revitalize abandoned buildings in Yonkers. The S.W.A.P. project has been a marvelous success largely due to her hard work.

Betsy Bennett's volunteer service has made a difference to everyone in the Yonkers community. She approaches each task with dedication that makes her certainly deserving of the 1986

WESTCHESTER VOLUNTEER OF THE YEAR AWARD

GROUP VOLUNTEER OF THE YEAR

The founders of the Respite Care Co-op are the award recipients in the Group category for 1986 Westchester Volunteer of the Year. They are: Donna Cofer, Cheryl Baskin, Sue Meyer, Anne Nichols, and Joanne LoPresti.

These women and their families joined together out of their common concern for the needs of preschool mentally retarded children.

The commonsense solution was to co-op their families.

The co-op currently provides child care services to mentally retarded children who might otherwise not receive proper care. The staff consists of a manager and four adult aides. Families can select from a variety of worry-free and cost-free babysitting services.

The founders of the Respite Care Co-op are to be commended for identifying a problem, finding a solution and seeing it through. Over the years, they have donated their own special talents and have been responsible for providing quality service not offered by other programs. Their involvement has made a real and positive difference in the lives of Yorktown families with mentally retarded children.

STUDENT VOLUNTEER OF THE YEAR

The 1986 Student Volunteer of the Year is Ms. Jennie Pidel, a student at Saunders Trades and Technical High School. Her volunteer activities cover a broad spectrum of interests ranging from a rape crisis counselor to a Little Sister in the Yonkers Big Sister/Big Brother program. Her first volunteer experience was when she served at Montifiori and North Central Hospitals.

I commend Ms. Pidel for sacrificing her spare time to better the Yonkers community. She is a model for all American youths.

RSVP VOLUNTEER OF THE YEAR

The Retired Senior Volunteer Program's (RSVP) Volunteer of the Year is Mrs. Dorothy Garber. RSVP is part of a nationwide network designed for persons 60 years of age and older who wish to use their skills, life experiences, time and energy in serving community needs.

As a volunteer, one of Mrs. Garber's primary interests is the Home for the Aged and Blind in Yonkers, NY. She contributes over 3 days a week to helping individuals in this Yonkers institution. Her warmth and companionship are always welcomed by the residents of the Home for the Aged and Blind.

Mrs. Garber is invaluable as she assists residents with their mail correspondence. She takes residents on walks and helps them with their shopping. She, also, is an assistant in the craft classes held at the home. Mrs. Garber is truly a lady to be admired.

CORPORATE AWARD

The 1986 Corporate Award winner is the "St-Att-Us" Volunteers. "The St-Att-Us" is a volunteer program composed of AT&T employees. These volunteers tutor students from White Plains Middle School, with a particular emphasis on Math and English.

AT&T volunteers, through their tutoring efforts, encourage and motivate these youngsters. AT&T grants these volunteers one hour off a day to tutor these While Plains students. The joint effort of AT&T and its selected employees have proven very effective and has deservedly been awarded this year's Corporate Award.

AGENCY AWARD

The Children's Village is the first recipient of Westchester's Corporate Volunteer Council Award. This award is given to highlight nonprofit agency programs that demonstrate the most creative use of corporate volunteers. The corporate volunteers serve as tutors, consultants, and friends. I congratulate the Children's Village on being the first to receive the Agency Award.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I would like to say that it gives me great pleasure to know that the spirit of volunteerism is still thriving in America today. The American people are truly this Nation's most valuable asset and I am proud to present the Westchester Volunteer Award winners to my colleagues.

VERMONT'S VOICE OF DEMOCRACY WINNER

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, more than 250,000 secondary students participated in the "Voice of Democracy" scriptwriting contest, an annual program conducted by the Veterans of Foreign Wars. The theme this year was "New Horizons for America's Youth."

Amy Lynn Shepard is the State winner from Vermont. She is a high school senior at Spaulding High School in Barre, VT. Upon graduation she hopes to attend an institution of higher education in Vermont and pursue a career in the theater.

Amy's winning statement speaks to the "agelessness" of youth, the attitude one has toward life which conveys a hope for the future. I am pleased to have this opportunity to share Amy's statement with all of you. A copy of the text follows:

I had walked that way to school every morning for three years, but this day was different. as I lifted my eyes from the wet pavement, my gaze fell first on the familiar, red building and then above it between two great mountains out from which the bright, orange morning sun was peeking through. In all its newborn glory, it opened the door of morning, and set a warm glow on my path and the large brick school I was approaching. I stopped and stood for a moment and watched. My mind and my heart and my attitude felt different that morning. Through the early mist I saw not only the sun rise, but opportunity rise, strength rise, truth rise, freedom rise; America rise. I witnessed the beginning of a new day, a day in which anything was possible. But I also realized that as an American youth, I had a responsiblity to take part in this new day, to take hold of it and use it. I must make this new day my horizon.

Yes, I am an American youth. But youth is not a stage in one's life or a physical appearance. Youth does not exclude the aged nor only address the young. For youth is an idea—an attitude. Youth is the willingness in our hearts to better ourselves. Youth is exuberance and hard work. Youth is not satisfied with mediocrity, but strives for the best.

Our country was founded on youth. The dreams and aspirations of those first settlers are the cornerstone of this country. Such far strength in those from home, eager to form a community in which men could truly live free, could only have come from the vitality of youth. Those who expanded our country, bringing it west in search of gold, followed their youthful dreams. A young Martin Luther King, Jr., exhausted all of his youthful energies into his cause abolishing racial discrimination and protecting the rights of black Americans everywhere.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, are those men filled with youth pride and courage, who fought and died for the name of their country in times of war.

American stands for Democracy, and through this democracy, every citizen has the right to take part in his country, to contribute what he has to give.

But, standing right along side America's beautiful freedoms, are America's serious problems. We do have our poor, our illiterate, and our homeless. America has its farmers who raise food for thousands of American families, but cannot make enough money to fee their own.

Like every other country, America has made its mistakes. But the one thing about the United States of America that is unlike any other country in the world is that we, the Youth of America, young or old, black or white, rich or poor have the opportunity, the ability, the freedom and the right to change. Our horizon is clearly in sight. We will resolve these problems, thereby making America the best it can possibly be. And with every new day, every new sunrise we must stop to look, as youthful Americans, to the point where our great land touches the vastness of the sky; our horizon.

IRS REVERSES POLICY ON INDIANS' SALMON-FISHING INCOME

HON. MIKE LOWRY

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting an article that appeared in the Washington Post last month entitled "IRS, Reversing Policy, Tries to Net Indians' Salmon-Fishing Income." This informative article discusses recent actions by the Internal Revenue Service that could abrogate the 1855 treaty between the United States and the Lummi Tribal Nation, which is located in Washington State. In a misguided reversal of policy, the IRS has determined that the Lummi Tribe must pay Federal taxes on income from salmon fishing. The action, which could affect all Indian resources, will be decided in court.

The IRS position is a clear violation of the 1855 treaty and a abdication of our Nation's special fiduciary responsibility to American Indian tribes. Moreover, because the Interior Department opposes the IRS position and the Treasury Department supports it, the Justice Department cannot represent either agency. The Lummis must therefore fight this battle in the courts alone.

In making treaties with the United States, American Indian tribes gave away incalculable wealth in land and natural resources. In exchange, they were guaranteed certain rights and were promised protection from non-Indian encroachment. These rights and protections are the cornerstones of the tribes' efforts to become economically independent, a goal supported by the current administration's 1983 Indian Policy Statement. Our Nation has broken faith on Indian treaties far too many times. Action by the IRS must not add to this shameful legacy.

This administration's economic policies have been marked by lavish tax cuts for large corporations and the well-to-do, lower funding for vital domestic programs, and massive increases in military spending. It is no wonder that the administration is looking for new sources of revenue. However, instead of trying to raise revenue by taxing Indian resources that are protected by law, the administration should develop economic policies that make sense.

I urge my colleagues to review the Washington Post article closely and work to oppose the IRS position.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 16, 1986]

IRS, REVERSING POLICY, TRIES TO NET INDIANS' SALMON-FISHING INCOME

(By Cass Peterson)

From a spit of a reservation in the extreme northwest tip of Washington state, members of the Lummi Indian tribe set out each summer to dip their salmon nets into the blue waters of Puget Sound.

They go to fish, perchance to catch and then to sell. It is a right reserved to the Lummi by the Treaty of Point Elliott 131 years ago and confirmed by the Supreme Court as recently as 1979.

The historic arrangement is occasionally tested by non-Indian commercial and sports fishermen who covet Lummi salmon and steelhead, but the tribe now faces a different and potentially more threatening adversary: the great white taxman.

In a reversal of policy, the Internal Revenue Service has decided that the Lummi must pay federal taxes on salmon income, which the Lummis contend would effectively abrogate their 1855 treaty and could lead to the loss of their tiny 12,500-acre reservation.

The IRS argues that Lummis must be treated like other American citizens, and that treaties were never intended to let Indians "take advantage" of the U.S. tax code. The Lummis respond that their members are not like any other American citizen and they have a 131-year-old document to prove it.

The spat has attracted the attention of tribes nationwide because while the potential tax take from salmon is small fry, financially speaking, tribal leaders are concerned that it could open the way for the IRS to lay claim to millions of dollars in tax revenue from Indian-owned oil, natural gas, minerals and timber.

"This has nothing to do with salmon," said Jewell James, head of the Lummi Treaty Rights Task Force. "It's a test case to get at the coal, oil and uranium. We're being set up for a domino effect."

"The IRS could use it, and they would," said Suzan Harjo, a lawyer and executive director of the National Congress of American Indians. "There has never been a tax on a reservation-derived resource."

The battle between the Internal Revenue Code and the Treaty of Point Elliott has sharply divided the Reagan administration.

Interior Secretary Donald Hodel, like former secretary James G. Watt before him, backs the Lummis. In letters last year to Attorney General Edwin Meese III and Treasury Secretary James A. Baker III, Hodel warned that IRS pursuit of the Lummis is not only an "attack" on treaty law but an "abrupt departure" from President Reagan's 1983 policy statement confirming the government's trust responsibility toward Indians.

Meese, however, has sided with the IRS. Because the Justice Department cannot represent both agencies, the Lummis must defend themselves.

"I have great sympathy for the tribe's position," said Ross O. Swimmer, assistant Interior secretary for Indian affairs. "I think the tribe has a good argument."

It is also, to hear the Indians tell it, a very well-used argument.

"Every time there's an economic crunch in the government, Treasury tries to tax some Indian resources," Said Joe DeLaCruz, chairman of the Quinault Indian Nation, another Washington state tribe that relies on salmon income. "They're looking around and saying, 'Geez, where can we get some more revenue?' "

Indians, like other Americans, pay federal and state taxes on income earned off the reservation. On-reservation income is taxed if it derives from sources not connected to the land—such as sales of tobacco, gas, groceries or clothing.

But because reservations are sovereign nations—Indians hold dual citizenship, in their nations and in the United States—income derived from their natural resources has long been held exempt from state and federal taxes.

"You must remember that these were nation-to-nation-treaties," said Raymond Field, director of the National Tribal Chairmen's Association.

The exemption makes Indian resources particularly attractive to developers, who can, through joint ventures on reservation land, skirt the oil-windfall tax, coal-severance tax and other brambles of the tax code.

Until a few years ago, the Lummis' salmon, while not technically attached to the land, enjoyed the same exemption. "In the past, some Indians have received forms and filled them out and paid the tax, and, lo and behold, the IRS refunded the tax," tribal official Samuel Cagey said.

In 1982, however, the IRS dunned Roy D. Earl, a Puyallup Indian from Washington state, for nonpayment of taxes on fishing income. IRS lawyers argued that Indians must pay the same taxes as other American citizens "unless an exemption from taxation can be found in the language of a treaty."

Earl argued in vain that Northwest fishing treaties, which predated the federal income tax by more than half a century, could not be expected to contain such language. The Tax Court decided for the IRS.

Since then, the IRS has filed more than 60 identical cases against members of the Lummi tribe, the largest fishing tribe with about $11 million in salmon and steelhead sales each year.

The Interior Department and Indian lawyers argue that the IRS is relying on what they politely term a lousy precedent. Earl was not enrolled in the Puyallup tribe, was not fishing in reserved Indian areas and was not represented by a lawyer who might have pointed out those discrepancies and led the court through the intricacies of treaty law.

The decision also runs contrary to most federal court decisions, which have held that Indian treaties must be interpreted as the Indians understood them when they were signed. Under that rationale, the courts have tossed out most attempts to assess Indians for state taxes, licensing fees and whatnot.

"It is no more likely that the Indians understood that the federal government would tax their fishing right than that they understood that future states would be able to impose a charge upon it," former Interior solicitor William Coldiron wrote in an opinion to Watt two years ago.

The IRS, however, has quite another view.

Treaties or no treaties, the agency told Interior, "as Indians individually attain an economic level comparable to that of other Americans, then it is to be expected that they will be taxed accordingly."

To allow otherwise, the IRS said, would leave the tax code at the mercy of Indians with "business expertise advanced well beyond the more primitive, land-oriented cultural stages."

Indians read that as a broad attack on all treaties and tribal resources, despite assurances to the contrary from Interior officials, "This would never result in Indians losing the fish," Swimmer said. "It's a very pure legal argument."

But on the Lummi reservation, the pure legal argument has a decidedly monetary edge. Unemployment on the reservation runs 85 percent most of the year, dropping to 40 percent during the four-month salmon season.

According to tribal secretary Cagey, one-third of the tribe's 3,000 members are registered to fish. Those who have boats, usually small skiffs, average $6,000 a year in sales. Those who crew on larger boats average $5,600.

Spread over more than 1,000 Lummi members, the $11 million in fishing income for the tribe would bring the treasury about $70,000 a year in tax payments, according to Interior estimates. Together with all the other fishing tribes, the IRS is looking at a potential tax take of $120,000.

"When Justice came in on this, they said, 'We side with the IRS on tribal resources,' " Cagey said. "They didn't say fishing resources. They can only get $70,000 from salmon, but they can get billions out of the natural resources of other tribes."

The IRS has suggested that the Lummis ask Congress for a specific exemption from the law, a move that Harjo and other Indian lawyers contend amounts to an admission that an exemption is needed and could prejudice cases involving other tribes and other resources.

"It doesn't make sense to go to Congress and clarify this because it's clear," she said.

But the Lummis acknowledge concern about what might happen if the tribe members lose. The IRS is seeking back taxes to 1978, and few of the members have cash to satisfy the debt. The taxman may have no recourse but to confiscate the Lummis' fishing boats, which the government helped buy in an effort to strengthen the reservation economy, and their homes on the reservation.

"That's probably the way it will happen," Cagey said glumly.

TERRORISM

HON. LYNN MARTIN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on April 6, I was privileged to address that annual Legislative Policy Conference of the American Israel Political Affairs Committee. At the same session the Ambassador from Israel, Meir Rosenne, addressed the conference on the topic of terrorism. I think his remarks are especially timely and wish to include in the RECORD the text of his speech.

ADDRESS BY AMBASSADOR MEIR ROSENNE AT AIPAC CONFERENCE

TERRORISM: WHO IS RESPONSIBLE, WHAT CAN BE DONE

I will speak today on the problem of terrorism—who is responsible for it, and what can be done to combat it.

Whenever I address the problem of terrorism, my mind is assailed by searing images which I cannot escape:

The slaughter of the Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Olympics.

The execution of Leon Klinghoffer, shot and pushed into the sea.

The killing of the 11-year-old daughter of the American journalist at Rome airport.

The standing ovation given to Yasser Arafat by the United Nations in 1974, when Secretary General Waldheim greeted him, and he sat with his gun in the chair reserved for Presidents.

The standing ovation at the 1980 World Conference on Women in Copehagen, afforded to the PLO terrorist Leila Haled, who hijacked a plane.

The terrorist holding his hand over the mouth of the pilot of TWA Flight 874 at Beirut airport last year.

The decapitated body of a five-year-old girl in Nahariya, in 1981.

The body of the American (woman) photographer on the beach at Herzlia, when Arafat's men killed a bus-load of 80 Israelis on the road to Haifa.

The freeing of the Entebbe hostages by the Israeli commandos in 1976.

These are the images. Those were the victims. Anyone sitting in this room could have been one of those victims. We have short memories, but the survivors—the sons and daughters, husbands and wives and parents—will live with the trauma for the rest of their lives.

We have become so used to terrorism that we tend to forget that anyone under 20 doesn't even know that there were times when you could board a plane without X-ray screening. Life will soon become unbearable unless we decide immediately to take the steps necessary to put an end to this disease.

Two things are required—political wisdom and moral will.

First comes a proper understanding of terrorism. Then it is a question of the will to act. So we must ask two questions: Who is responsible for the persistence of terrorism, and what can be done to combat it?

(1) The responsibility lies with those democratic states that thought that Israel would be the only victim. Now they see their own innocent citizens victimized.

(2) The responsibility lies with those who make a distinction between terrorists, saying that Abu Nidal is a "bad" terrorist but Arafat is a "good" terrorist.

My friends, there is no such thing as a good terrorist, and anyone who makes such a distinction in effect condones and encourages terrorism. Indeed, such distinctions inevitably paralyze action whenever terrorism rears it ugly head.

(3) The responsibility lies with the West European states of the European Economic Community that, because of oil, adopted a resolution in November 1973, following the invasion of Israel by Syria and Egypt, condemning the victim rather than the aggressors.

(4) The responsibility lies with those who for years refused the extradition of terrorists, but instead let them go free.

I shall never forget that, when I served as Legal Advisor to Israel's Foreign Ministry, Israel requested, jointly with West Germany and in conformity with our extradition treaty, the extradition of Abu Daoud, the terrorist conspirator who organized the Munich killings; he was set free because there was fear of retaliation by the PLO and Arafat.

(5) The responsibility lies with all those Western states that have accorded virtual diplomatic status to the PLO and have permitted PLO offices to function, with respectability and legitimacy, as bases from which to launch their terrorist murder.

(6) The responsibility lies with all those states, in all corners of the world, whose ambassadors accorded a standing ovation to Arafat after he addressed the UN General Assembly.

Let's face it: The hands that applauded there were condoning the atrocities committed by the terrorists before and after that dark day in 1974.

(7) The responsibility lies with those states that regard the terrorist gangs as comradely anti-Western and anti-democratic forces, and permit them to be trained on their territories, and provide them with weapons and ammunition, funds, diplomatic, political, economic, and intelligence and moral support.

It has long since been amply demonstrated—especially in the vast amount of PLO documents captured in the 1982 Lebanon war—that the Soviet Union is at the heart of this enterprise, in league with its East German and other allies. These states are accomplices in the commission of terrorist atrocities.

(8) The responsibility lies with the United Nations which only this year, for the first time in its history, adopted a resolution, in the Security Council, condemning terrorism. But this ignoble, decades-long delay should come as no surprise: This was the same UN that refused to condemn anti-semitism in 1964, and that equated Zionism with Nazism in 1975.

(9) The responsibility lies with states like Syria, Libya, Iraq, Iran, that organize, direct and support proxy terrorist forces, and provide every kind of practical assistance to the terrorists. These are lawless states engaged in lawless actions—they are guilty of state terrorism.

(10) The responsibility lies with those who seek the "root causes" of terrorism, and who seek to "explain" or "understand" the terrorists and their motivations and aspirations. Such explanations function in effect to justify terrorist acts.

This fashionable "understanding" is a form of moral confusion. All over the world there are all sorts of groups with all sorts of grievances. If "understanding" were to be extended to their "root causes," they would have carte blanche to murder, in order to gain "redress". Should they be permitted to run amok with their Kalashnikovs?

Mass murder is mass murder, and no grievance can justify it, nor will "understanding" avert or eliminate terrorism.

(11) The responsibility lies with the countries that condemned Israel for having taken action, at great risk to itself, against PLO headquarters outside Tunis. The UN Security Council resolution condemning the raid was an encouragement to even more terrorism. Instead of punishing the aggressor, the victim was indicted. And now the PLO fighters boast publicly of being back in Beirut, in force.

(12) The responsibility lies with the oil-producing states that exploited their extortionate "oil weapon" to try to impose solutions that would have brought about the end of the State of Israel. And it was a sad moment in European history to see how democratic states were ready to accept the diktat of hoodlums in place of the principles of enlightened diplomacy.

Even though this problem no longer exists, it is worth remembering, for the future . . .

* * * * *

What can be done?

First, we have to realize that terrorism did not begin with the problem of the Palestinian Arabs, and it will not end if and when that problem is resolved.

Terrorism is rooted in the culture of violence in some countries. Internecine Arab terrorism, for example, is a natural part of Mideast politics, and this atmosphere is hospitable to the extension of terrorism beyond the Arab world itself—against Israel, against France, against Britain, etc. It is in the context of that traditional culture of violence that the terrorism perpetrated against Israel by the Arab world is to be understood.

Second, we have to realize that there is no appeasing terrorists, who threaten not only Israel but Western democratic society. Those nations, especially in Western Europe, that have appeased the PLO should have learned from their own bitter historical experience that appeasement only inspires contempt, scorn, and further aggression.

Acting on these basic principles, democratic states have an array of weapons to use against terrorism.

(1) There are enough legal tools available—international conventions against terrorism, hijacking, extradition. Unfortunately, these legal instruments are rarely if ever enforced. All civilized nations must adhere to and implement them.

(2) All offices of terrorist organizations, such as those of the PLO, should be closed and their operations banned.

(3) It should be made clear by the political decisions of democratic governments that there can be no bonus for terrorism. No one should try to pacify a terrorist organization such as the PLO by granting it the privilege of being a party to any political or diplomatic negotiation. Any attempt to compromise, in any shape, manner or form, with terrorist gangs will only encourage terrorism.

(4) There must be a total ban on landing rights in the democratic countries for the airplanes of states—like Libya, Syria, Iran, Iraq—that encourage terrorism.

(5) No commercial exchanges, no economic relations, should be established with countries that provide assistance to terrorist organizations, and sanctions should be taken against such states.

We do not think there is any justification for considering Saudi Arabia a peace-loving country so long as it provides—as it has been doing for years—$250 million a year to the PLO—funds that are used for killing Americans, Israelis, and other innocents.

(6) There must be closer cooperation in the exchange of intelligence information among democratic governments. Fortunately, the framework for a system for such exchange already exists; it should be broadened and strengthened.

(7) The role of the mass media, especially television, in providing instant, intense and wide-ranging attention to acts of international terrorism must be very carefully evaluated. On the one hand, there are the fundamental freedoms of press and speech to be zealously protected. On the other hand, we must recognize that those very freedoms are abused and exploited by the terrorists—for what they seek, above all, is publicity.

The tension between freedom and the requirements of security is not new, nor is it restricted to the area of terrorism. Very possibly, this is a tension that will never be fully resolved, and will always remain a dilemma for democratic societies to grapple with, especially in emergency situations. But in doing so, we should always be keenly aware of the dangers to our freedoms posed by those who would curtail or destroy them.

(8) Finally, a profoundly important moral/intellectual dimension. All too often, people in democratic societies praise, or at least condone, so-called national liberation movements for using terrorist means to gain their ends.

A legitimate movement of freedom fighters for national liberation does not, like the PLO, use violence as a first resort—does not target innocent civilians—does not, like the PLO, aim to annihilate its adversary.

Acceptance of such behavior reflects not only a debasement of language, but a deep moral and intellectual confusion, which must be rigorously clairfied and rejected if we are to be able to act decisively against terrorism.

* * * * *

It has become fashionable to include something on terrorism at every conference on the Middle East. But I did not come here this afternoon to add my bit to this fad.

I came to express my solidarity, and the solidarity of the State of Israel—and, if I may say so, of the Jewish people—with all the victims of terrorism and their families:

With all those who lost their dear ones at airports in Paris, Vienna, Rome, Munich.

With the members of the various diplomatic corps still held in captivity.

With the American Ambassador to the Sudan who was murdered by Arafat's men in 1972.

With Bar Simantov, my Counselor of the Embassy in Paris, who was shot down on Saturday, April 3, 1982, in front of his wife and his eight-year-old daughter.

With the innocent civilian patrons of department stores and cafes in Rome and Paris.

With my dear friend and close colleagues of 30 years—Shlomo Argov—a man of great humanity and a diplomat of unequalled talent and skill who in the 1960s and 1970s served Israel in this city of Washington with distinction, devotion and pride—and subsequently our Ambassador in England, who was gunned down in the streets of London four years ago—and who, now paralyzed, is doomed to spend the rest of his life in a wheel chair in Jerusalem.

We who meet here, at an AIPAC conference, have a solemn moral obligation to remember the fate of Shlomo Argov and all the other victims, to let that memory and those images spur us on to determined and vigorous efforts to battle terrorism to the end.

Thank you very much.

LET'S RENEW OUR COMMITMENT TO MARITIME EDUCATION

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, on which I serve, recently approved H.R. 4175, the MarAd Authorization for fiscal year 1987.

Contained in this legislation is badly needed funding for the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy in King's Point, NY. In addition, the bill includes assistance for the State maritime academies in California, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New York and Texas.

Many of us were disappointed by the administration's request to eliminate funding for the State maritime academies, and ultimately to force the committee to take some funds for King's Point to offset this shortfall.

We hear frequently about the demise of the U.S. merchant marine. We are told that the administration believes that a strong merchant marine is vital for our Nation's defense. Yet we see administration policies which undermine building a future for this industry by eliminating funds to train young men and women in the maritime profession.

Many of us know graduates from King's Point or the State academies. They serve as senior executives for many maritime companies. They are the officers and mates on ships which sail from Baltimore, New York, Long Beach and New Orleans. They are the men and women whom we call upon first in a national crisis to serve on the ships which carry supplies to our troops in hostile parts of the world.

The schools which trained these individuals serve as the foundation for the U.S. merchant marine of tomorrow. The money we give to these institutions is not just a current expense, but a valuable investment in the future of our merchant fleet.

Even though our U.S.-flag fleet has sunk to historically low levels, I believe that shipping is a business which runs in cycles. The slump of the late 1970's and the 1980's will reverse itself, provided we promote the industry, and train the people necessary to help put it back on its feet.

In fact, a recently completed defense study indicated we will need the equivalent of 75 new handy-size tankers by 1990 if we are to have sufficient sealift capacity. This alone suggests that cutting maritime education is penny-wise today and pound-foolish for tomorrow.

The Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee has strongly supported maritime education in the past and has taken steps to protect it in the era of Gramm-Rudman. I suggest that the House take seriously the principle that the next generation is our brightest hope for the future and continue to fight the loss of funds for maritime education during the debate on the fiscal year 1987 budget.

MATH EDUCATION IN UNITED STATES IS BOTH SUPERB AND MEDIOCRE

HON. TIMOTHY J. PENNY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, the week of April 14 through April 20, 1986, has been designated as "National Mathematics Awareness Week."

The purpose of the designation is to bring about an increased public awareness of the vital importance of mathematics education in America. As the author of the following article recently stated in his testimony before the National Science Board:

The mathematics community itself has recognized the need for coordinated action to address the basic facts of mathematics and mathematics education: that mathematics is fundamental to science, that it is changing rapidly, and that it is a seamless fabric from grade school to graduate school.

Lynn Arthur Steen, a professor of mathematics at St. Olaf College in Minnesota, also serves as the President of the Mathematical Association of America. In an article which recently appeared in the Minneapolis Star and Tribune, Mr. Steen uses the Minnesota example to point out the inconsistency of mathematics education today. He stresses that the policy that must be followed is one of commitment to excellence. I agree.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to share Mr. Steen's fine commentary with my colleagues.

[From the Minneapolis Star and Tribune, Mar. 31, 1986]

MATH EDUCATION IN U.S. IS BOTH SUPERB AND MEDIOCRE

(By Lynn Arthur Steen)

NORTHFIELD, MN.—There are two sides to every story, but frequently only one makes headlines. "U.S. students near bottom in 18-nation math study" was on the front page of the Star and Tribune March 12. "U.S. students near top in International Mathematical Olympiad" was not on the front page—or on any page—of the Star and Tribune last summer.

Such are the vagaries of journalism—bad news captures headlines, good news doesn't. Nevertheless, the headline that was printed and the one that wasn't are both true. That's a paradox worth exploring: How can U.S. students be near both the bottom and the top of international comparisons of mathematical achievement?

Other paradoxes arise when one looks closely at mathematics education in Minnesota. On the one hand, we read regularly about our state's high standing in the SAT scores. On the other hand, Minnesota regularly performs near the bottom of the American High School Mathematics Examination that screens U.S. students for the International Mathematical Olympiad.

One lesson from this is that averages of test scores reflect quality about as reliably as do pronouncements by the proverbial used-car salesman. So many factors can influence average scores—such as which students take the exam or how well the exam matches the curriculum—that one should never jump to conclusions.

The truth is that U.S. mathematics education is both superb and mediocre. At every educational level, from primary school through graduate school, certain institutions provide mathematics education at a quality unmatched anywhere in the world. But the diversity of education in the United States is greater than in any other industrialized nation. We have the best of schools and the worst of schools.

Many attribute our educational problems to the stress caused by great cultural diversity. Compared with the rest of the United States, Minnesota is relatively homogenous. For this reason, Minneapolis was selected as a comparison city for a recent cross-cultural study of mathematics achievement with young children in China and Japan—to test the hypothesis that the educational strengths of other cultures are due to a more homogenous society with common goals and social climate. This study, reported last month in Science, indicates that Minneapolis children lag behind their peers in Japan and China as early as kindergarten.

Americans want to be internationally competitive, to prepare students for a technological world society. Some academic indicators suggest that we are competitive, others that we are not. Each year the United States regularly places in the top five on the International Mathematical Olympiad. Yet we rank near the bottom on the International Assessment at grades 8 and 12, and U.S. students applying for graduate school in mathematics score 100 points lower than do students from other nations on the Graduate Record Examination in mathematics.

During the past decade, as the need for mathematical methods has increased in various fields, undergraduate mathematics enrollments have doubled. Yet the number who are willing to dig deeply—to major in mathematics—is now less than half what it was 15 years ago. What's worse, nearly three-fourths of post-secondary credits in mathematics are now awarded for courses universally considered to be part of the secondary curriculum.

We should draw from the mixed headlines a very simple conclusion: that we do have the ability and talent to be internationally competitive, but we are not currently achieving that goal. We lack not talent but determination—a commitment to insist on strong mathematical preparation at every step in the educational process.

We live in a world of mathematical models in which robotic control and computer simulation are the keys to industrial productivity. Mathematics is the foundation discipline for this new world: It provides necessary tools for many other disciplines and at the same time helps develop patterns of analytical thinking.

Minnesota has several distinctive resources for mathematics and mathematics education that we should use as a basis for future strength:

The University of Minnesota is host to one of only three advanced mathematics research institutes in the United States. At this institute, researchers from around the world create the new mathematics needed for diverse applications, from economics to medicine, from computer engineering to atmospheric dynamics.

Minnesota has many strong private liberal-arts colleges that as a group have traditionally been unusually productive of science and mathematics graduates. Carleton College, for example, ranked near the top in a recent national survey of undergraduate origins of Ph.D. scientists, while St. Olaf College will graduate nearly 100 mathematics majors this year—about 1 percent of the total national pool.

With support from the National Science Foundation, the University of Minnesota and St. Olaf College have just launched the Minnesota Mathematics Mobilization (M3 for short), a statewide network destined to provide a common forum for education, industry and government leaders to work together to improve mathematics education at all levels. M3 will be one of the first state-level nodes in a national network being established by a new Mathematics Sciences Education Board of the National Research Council.

Children now in school will be our grandchildren's teachers at the beginning of the 21st century. The mathematics they need to learn is not just the mathematics our grandparents learned. The computer revolution is, at its heart, a revolution in applied mathematics. A lot of important new mathematics is developed every year to fuel our nation's scientific and economic progress. Sound educational practice requires that we make this new mathematics visible both in the curriculum (where policy is made) and in the classroom (where students are taught).

The headlines currently reveal that the quality of U.S. mathematics education is uneven. That's true of Minnesota as well as of the nation. In Minnesota at least we have the resources to correct this: good schools, outstanding colleges and universities, strong public support for education, technologically oriented industries. What we need is commitment to the principle that in education we cannot afford any policy that falls short of excellence.

RESPECTED BROOKINGS ECONOMISTS SAY GRAMM-RUDMAN-HOLLINGS GOALS ARE ATTAINABLE

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out last year during the debate on the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill, "for the first time, the consensus is there to accomplish a sound fiscal footing for this country, and we intend to take full advantage of it." With a bipartisan effort, we passed the bill.

Now, I was pleased to read in the Washington Post of Friday, April 11, 1986 an article by John Berry concerning the new review by the Brookings Institution," Economic Choices of 1987."

Berry reports that the targets we set "appear to be both politically attainable and economically sound, given the current state of the economy."

We all know that legislation to balance the budget can always run afoul of the spending needs of one group or another. However, if we remain united in our commitment to achieve a common national goal—balancing the budget and keeping it balanced—we can work out the difficult situations without capricious cuts in civilian programs.

Under unanimous consent, I include John Berry's article:

GRAMM-RUDMAN GOALS SAID TO BE ATTAINABLE

BROOKINGS ECONOMISTS CALL TARGETS SOUND

(By John M. Berry)

The federal budget deficit targets set by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law over the next three years "appear to be both politically attainable and economically sound, given the current state of the economy," according to a group of prominent Brookings Institution economists.

"The specified downward path of deficits is not likely to be so steep as to precipitate a recession," the economists wrote in a review of the federal budget, which is scheduled for release today. "Indeed, the fall in oil prices and further declines in the value of the dollar and interest rates can be expected to stimulate the economy and offset the restrictive effect of deficit reduction."

Authors of the review, "Economic Choices 1987," include Alice Rivlin, former head of the Congressional Budget Office, and Charles L. Schultze, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers in the Carter administration. The others are Henry J. Aaron, Harvey Galper, Joseph A. Pechman and George L. Perry. Rivlin is director of economic studies at Brookings and the others are senior fellows there.

Even after the first round of mandatory spending cuts under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, the deficit for the current fiscal year is forecast to be $200 billion or more, an amount equal to about 5 percent of the gross national product. Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sets a target of $144 billion for the fiscal 1987 deficit, with each succeeding year's target lowered by $36 billion and the budget balanced in 1991.

While the authors endorsed the deficit targets through 1989, they urge that they not be achieved just by spending cuts concentrated in a limited number of nondefense programs, as recommended by President Reagan in his 1987 budget. They also rejected the process of automatic cuts in defense and some nondefense programs required by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings if the targets are missed by more than $10 billion.

Instead, the authors proposed a set of smaller spending cuts supplemented by a tax increase that would raise about $50 billion in fiscal 1989. Whether the deficit should be eliminated after the following two years would depend upon economic developments between now and 1989, they said.

The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings process of automatic cuts is a sort of "doomsday machine" that everyone wants to avoid at all costs, they said, "Slashing defense spending as much as would be required under the package that preserves Gramm-Rudman-Hollings priorities would be risky to national security," they argued.

Similarly, they added, under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings "deep cuts in civilian programs would curtail important government services. Programs that hardly anyone regards as wasteful—scientific research, medical care for low-income people, job training, and maintenance of the nation's highways and bridges—would be cut."

The president has proposed "some sensible cuts and reforms in various programs," the authors said, but "his continued commitment to defense growth and opposition to a tax increase force him to subject social programs to cuts that are both excessive and politically unacceptable."

The economists listed several options for tax increases to raise $50 billion in 1989, including higher excise taxes on gasoline, alcohol and tobacco and a new tax on domestic and imported crude oil, a 4 percent value added tax and higher income taxes.

They said they prefer an increase in corporate and personal income tax rates once this year's tax code overhaul is completed. Either a 2 percentage point increase in personal and corporate rates or a 9 percent surcharge would raise the required amount, they estimated.

The authors also urge consideration of changes in the current budget process, which they said has been severely strained by the impasse on how to deal with the deficit.

Gramm-Rudman-Hollings ought to be repealed and the rest of the budget process greatly simplified, they said, with budgets adopted for two years and the authorization and appropriation functions handled by only one committee.

WHITEVILLE-BEST BASEBALL TOWN IN U.S.A.

HON. CHARLES ROSE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, the May issue of Sport magazine has a section called "Sports Towns U.S.A." that features, as the city where baseball is THE GAME, Whiteville, in North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I can attest to the accuracy of the selection of Whiteville, the county seat of Columbus County, as the city where baseball is baseball. I have the good fortune to represent the citizens of that good community, and I would like to include the article with my remarks, so that the Members of the House can read about real baseball people and a real baseball town. I know that some members represent cities with big league teams, but so often that kind of baseball is as artificial as the grass it is played on. Real baseball can be found at Legion Field in Whiteville, where the infield is dirt, and where Coach Linwood Hedgpath—only Coach Hedgpath—is authorized to rake the infield.

SONS OF THE BASEBALL SOIL

(By David Whitford)

Can't afford to miss a day in February, warm as it is. When we get a pretty one like this we jump on it." Linwood Hedgpeth is standing in front of the grandstand at Legion Field in Whiteville, North Carolina. Whiteville (population 5,565) is on the coastal plain, 50 miles as the alligator swims (through Green Swamp) from Cape Fear. It is sometimes cold in February; folks know what snow is. But there are lots of days like this one, when the clouds bust open, the old Carolina sun burns through and (sigh) it smells like baseball.

Hedgpeth is 46 years old, gray-haired but boyish. He is wearing a blue-satin North Carolina 2A State Championship jacket, one of four he owns for championships won here ('83, '85) and at nearby Hallsboro High ('75, '78). Hedgpeth has another blue-satin jacket for the state American Legion championship Whiteville won last summer.

Over 30 of his former players have gone on to Division I college baseball. Twelve have signed professionally, including the Nixon brothers, Otis (Cleveland Indians) and Donell (Seattle Mariners), and Tommy Greene, the 1985 first-round draft choice of the Atlanta Braves. Patrick Lennon, a senior at Whiteville High, has already been tabbed by pro scouts as a certain first-round pick in the June draft.

They are only the most recent expressions of a proud baseball past. At one time there were more than 40 professional teams in North Carolina. In the golden age after the war, scores of local boys left Whiteville and surrounding parts of Columbus County to play pro ball, but few ever made it out of the low minors. With expansion, minor league baseball faded here and everywhere else. Today there are just 8 teams left in the state. Folks found other distractions; television, stock-car racing and (gasp) softball.

But in Whiteville something endures, a baseball myth. It has to do with long summers and mild winters, with smooth clay infields, with tobacco. It lingers in the living memory of boys who never made it, who came home, who went ahead with their lives, but who still come out to the ballpark to watch the kids. In Whiteville, scouts know they still play country hardball.

Rudy Williams is one of the boys who never made it. He was a 19-year-old right-hander with a 95-mph fastball and home-run power when the Pirates called him to a tryout in Pittsburgh. Thirty-five years later, Williams remembers: "I walked into Branch Rickey's office under the stands there in Forbes Field. He reminded me of old John L. Lewis—big bushy eyebrows. His desk was probably about 10 feet long, loaded with stuff. It was up on a little platform, sort of like in a courtroom.

"So he looked at me under those eyebrows and he says, 'Son,' he says, 'let me say this.' He says, 'You come with the Pirate organization and I think you can come as an outfielder just as easily as a pitcher. But we need pitchers in this organization.'

"I signed with 'em, signed a two-year, no-cut, major-league contract. Then I called Dad. He says, 'Hey.' He says, 'Folks here'd rather you be a water boy with the Yankees than a regular with anybody else. Boy, I want you to catch the next plane.' "

Williams played at Wake Forest and later did sign with the Yankees. He made it as high as Birmingham in Double A before he threw his arm out and came home. "I often think, if I had gone with the Pirates, maybe I'd have never been injured," Williams says. "Hindsight's not worth a damn. But I feel like at that point, had I gone ahead and gotten involved in major league baseball, I'd have been there for 20 years. I really do. I do."

By 4:00, the Whiteville junior varsity is on the field and Hedgpeth is sitting cross-legged in the dugout, holding a cigarette between thumb and forefinger, like a nail. Hedgpeth is married to baseball, that and trout lines. Closest he ever came to getting hitched was right after college. Missed the wedding, though; at the appointed hour he was standing in a third-base coaching box.

Nearby, packing their gear in bags that carry big-league insignia, are the Nixon brothers and Tommy Greene. Donell is coming back from a broken leg suffered last year in the final week of spring training. Otis is working at being more aggressive at the plate. "You can't be a Punch-and-Judy act all your life," Hedgpeth tells him.

This spring, all of Whiteville will be following senior Patrick Lennon, a 6-2, 195-pound speedster who pitches, plays shortstop and hits with power. Lennon, like the Nixons, is black. Before 1969, Whiteville had separate school systems. Today, unlike some other southern towns where all-white academies perpetuate segregation, children in Whiteville—which is about 35 percent black—attend public schools together. "If Patrick had come around 20 years ago," says Tom Lewis, principal of Whiteville High, "he might never have had a chance."

Already, Lennon is being hailed as "the best all-around athlete in Columbus County history." He has major-college or professional opportunities in all three sports, yet his mind is made up. "When I was a little kid, I used to sit and watch baseball games with my father," Lennon says. "There's nothing like it, watching them boys hit the ball out of the park. I would always say, 'That's what I want to do someday.' " No one doubts that, come June, Lennon will be chosen early in the baseball draft, and he will sign.

The greatest game ever played at Legion Field—"The best game I ever saw and I have seen a World Series or two," says Jiggs Powers, semiretired sports editor of the biweekly News Reporter—is still talked about in Whiteville as if it were yesterday. Principal Lewis was there, a boy then, chasing foul balls behind the grandstand. Rudy Williams was on the bench, a 15-year-old hotshot who gave way to the veteran because this game "was the highest of magnitude."

In the home dugout were the Whiteville Leafs (Or were they still the Red Comets then?), a fast semi-pro team started by Rudy's dad, Clyde R. Williams.

The visitors were a college team from Wake Forest, 20 victories and no losses and on their way to the national championship tournament. "We were fortunate," says Powers. "We had a fellow, local man named Charlie Ripple, pitched for Sacramento in the Pacific Coast League. He had been released and came home the night before the ballgame. Whiteville got their run in the first inning"—single to right, triple to left-center—"and Ripple handled it the rest of the way."

That was 1949. The Leafs hung on another twenty years. Mr. Clyde was manager and played in his last game when he was past 60, even got two hits. He died last June on his way to watch Whiteville in the state finals.

Past 7:00 now, the moon is up, the lights are on and the varsity is still practicing. On this particular patch of burnt-orange Carolina clay, before there was a ballpark, there was a camp for German prisoners from World War II. Today all that remains are some unmarked graves out beyond the rightfield fense, near where the trees begin and the land falls off into swamp. "The graveyard's in the corner of that property," says Lewis. "I don't know whe'er, uh, they bumped off some of those German prisoner-of-war guys and buried them or not."

The frogs are whistling in the swamp. A fog swirls in over the old graveyard, through the chain-link fence, and settles in the outfield, mingling with the breath of the ballplayers running their sprints.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE TOM HALL

HON. ED JONES

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the late Tom Hall, a native of Millington, TN, and the mayor of that city for 24 years. Tom Hall represented all of the best that we strive to be.

He was a small businessman whose interest in his community led him to serve one term as an alderman and then six terms as its mayor. In all of those years, he epitomized what community service ought to be. During his time as mayor, Millington grew from a city of 5,500 people to a city of 22,000. He led the city's effort to cope with that growth without plunging it into debt. In fact, he made sure that the city did not enter into obligations unless it could pay for them first.

Tom Hall earned many accolades and honors as a result of his many years of service. I consider it a privilege to be counted among his many friends. He was a man of great integrity and honesty on whom the people of Millington, placed many responsibilities. He is going to be greatly missed by his community but not nearly so much as by his family and his many friends who held him in such high regard.

In closing, let me just say that I have never known anyone with more knowledge or ability to handle the affairs of municipality, large or small. As one of the men who served as a city alderman during Mr. Hall's 24 years as mayor said, "He was a mayor of a small town, but he was not a small town mayor."

HMO'S

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as an original member of the House Select Committee on Aging I have a strong interest in the rapid growth of health maintenance organizations in our Nation. HMO's are groups of health care facilities and personnel who provide a comprehensive range of health services to members who enroll voluntarily and pay a fixed prepaid fee.

Consider in the United States today there are now almost 400 HMO's operating in the United States. A 67-percent increase from 1980. The total number of persons enrolled in HMO's now totals 18.9 million—a 100-percent increase since 1980.

Of special interest to me is the fact that of the total number of HMO's in the Nation almost two-thirds are receiving Medicare funds largely aided by recent regulations permitting Medicare coverage for HMO services. A developing trend in the HMO field is new competition between the nonprofit and for profit sectors. The responsibility which we have in Congress is to make sure that the constant that is not varied in this competition is quality of care for the elderly participant.

On February 24 I conducted a hearing of my Subcommittee on Human Services in New York on HMO's. One of the most disturbing information I learned from this hearing were reports that certain HMO's were already engaged in a process of "creaming" those older people seeking to enroll. This involves approval applications of those with fewer problems and more resources. We must continue to monitor all developments with HMO's to make sure that this boon does not become a boondoggle to the taxpayers of our Nation.

EMPLOYMENT DISCRIMINATION

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation, along with 42 of my colleagues, recognizing that employment discrimination against persons who have, or have had, cancer does exist and expressing the sense of Congress in opposition to this terrible injustice. This resolution, House Concurrent Resolution —, expresses the sense of Congress in opposition to this discrimination and urges that these Americans receive fair and equal treatment in our Nation's workplace.

Employment discrimination against cancer survivors is not an isolated or hypothetical problem. It is, in fact, an outrage which victimizes 1 out of every 5 persons with a cancer history—over 1 million Americans. It is a terrible injustice reaching epidemic proportions across our Nation's workplace. Many blame the "death-sentence" myth attached to cancer for employment discrimination. But the death sentence is indeed a myth. We have spent fortunes on cancer research, and it is paying off. In fact, by the year 1990, one out of every 1,000 people will be childhood survivors of this disease. As medical research continues to provide extraordinary breakthroughs in the treatment of cancer—the number of survivors—and job discrimination victims—will continue to dramatically increase. It is imperative that we recognize and address this violation of rights before we have millions of new victims of cancer-based employment discrimination.

Often, when a person hears the words "It's malignant," the fight to conquer cancer begins. But many who have waged that war admit they face an equally tough battle—the fight to receive fair treatment at work. For these people having won the battle against cancer is not enough. They must then fight job denial, wage reduction, exclusion from and reduction in benefits, promotion denial, and in some cases, outright dismissal. We, as a society, must stop this grievous violation of rights and ensure equal protection under the law.

I have long been involved in the fight to eliminate this terrible injustice. I first authored legislation during the 98th session of Congress to outlaw employment discrimination against cancer survivors. At this time, I have a bill, H.R. 1294, to eliminate employment discrimination against persons on the basis of cancer history by amending title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. This bill enjoys the strong, bipartisan support of over 80 House Members. Yet it is obvious that we must continue the fight against this discrimination.

It is my hope that this resolution will increase public awareness and understanding of cancer. Through this public education process, the myths, prejudice, and misconceptions surrounding persons with a cancer history can be shattered—the same myths that often foster cancer-based employment discrimination. Hopefully, this awareness will ultimately increase the employability of cancer survivors.

Equality is the principle upon which this great Nation was founded. We pride ourselves on affording equal opportunity for all Americans. Such opportunity must be extended to the millions of cancer survivors so that we permit, and encourage, these people to remain fully integrated and productive members of society and our workplace. Let us never forget what we are opposing—employment discriminaton against cancer survivors, persons who have endured so much, triumphed over many obstacles, but who continue to be victimized and stigmatized.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I have inserted the full text of the resolution into the RECORD.

Whereas there are more than five million Americans in our nation with a cancer history and an estimated one million of these persons face the terrible injustice of employment discrimination;

Whereas 66 million Americans—one out of every four—will eventually develop cancer in their lifetime;

Whereas one out of every two persons now diagnosed as having cancer is cured, and as a result, the number of survivors will continue to dramatically increase;

Whereas employment discrimination against persons on the basis of cancer history ranges from job denial to wage reduction, exclusion from and reduction in benefits, promotion denial, and in some cases, outright dismissal; and

Whereas we must permit, and encourage, these people to remain fully integrated and productive members of society: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), Expressing the sense of Congress in opposition to employment discrimination against persons who have, or have had, cancer based on such individual's cancer history and urges the Congress that these Americans receive fair and equal treatment in the workplace.

NATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR ADOPTION

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, as a cochairman of the Congressional Coalition on Adoption, I would like to commend one organization in particular for its efforts on behalf of children, adoptive parents, and birth-parents.

Yesterday began the National Committee on Adoption's Sixth Annual Maternity Services and Pregnancy Counseling Conference. With a membership of more than 120 voluntary, private adoption agencies, NCFA is dedicated to improving adoption services in this country. The committee keeps its members informed about developments and changes in State and Federal programs and laws, as well as relevant court decisions.

One of NCFA's missions is to ensure that accurate information on adoption exists and is made available. Toward this end, the committee publishes newsletters and holds these annual conferences. Moreover, NCFA has published the "Adoption Factbook," filling a need in the public and private sectors for data and materials relating to adoption.

I wish the National Committee for Adoption success at its annual meeting and thank its members for their efforts on behalf of children and parents.

INTRODUCTION OF H.R. 4617, A BILL TO PROVIDE FOR AN EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING CLAIMS FOR CREDITS OR REFUND OF FEDERAL INCOME TAXES WITH RESPECT TO CERTAIN CHANGES INVOLVING INSOLVENT FARMERS

HON. HAL DAUB

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985 was signed into law by the President on April 7, 1986, after considerable delay in the House and in the other body. Section 13208 of that act generally provides that the transfer of farmland by an insolvent farmer to a creditor in cancellation of indebtedness, or to a third party under threat of foreclosure, will not give rise to alternative minimum tax liability. The amendment is effective for transfers of farmland after December 31, 1981.

The normal 3-year statute of limitations for timely filed 1982 calendar year returns expired on April 15, 1986. Insolvent farmers seeking the protection of the new amendment with respect to calendar year 1982 were required, therefore, to file an amended 1982 return on or before April 15, 1986, just 8 days after the Budget Reconciliation Act was signed into law. This obviously was not enough time for those insolvent farmers seeking the protection of the amendment to react to the new law. The repeated delays in passing the Budget Reconciliation Act has, practically speaking, undermined the clear intent of the act to assist insolvent farmers beginning with calendar year 1982 transfers of farmland.

In order to more fully carry out the original intent of the Budget Reconciliation Act, I am introducing a bill that would extend the statute of limitations for a short period for purposes of taking advantage of the insolvent farmer provision in the Budget Reconciliation Act. The bill provides that if a taxpayer is prevented from claiming a refund or credit resulting from the insolvent farmer provision in the Budget Reconciliation Act at any time before October 16, 1986, then the refund or credit will nevertheless be allowed if claim therefor is filed within 6 months of the date of enactment of the bill.

I would urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting this small but important change to the Budget Reconciliation Act. Thank you.

INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION NEEDED TO COMBAT TERRORIST THREAT

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it is truly regrettable that the French Government refused to allow United States aircraft to overfly that country.

Margaret Thatcher of Britain, however, stood firm. She is to be commended for taking a brave stand. She held out her hand when America needed her help.

In this age of terrorism, international cooperation is needed to combat the terrorist threat. The free world cannot afford to turn and run from terrorist dictators.

Although the French Government had recently indicated a growing resolve to confront terrorism, that Government refused a request for overflight rights for the U.S. bombers. When they were put on the spot, the French blinked.

Their ambiguous attitude caused our pilots to fly an extra 2,500 miles to skirt the coast of Europe on their way to Libya. They were exposed to possible detection by being in the air that long. They arrived on target fatigued and stressed.

No wonder the Libyan Ambassador in Paris congratulated the French Government for turning down America's request. Fortunately, America does have a friend over there.

When the going got tough, Prime Minister Thatcher stood firm. She defended our decision and said that those bombers were needed for the task at hand. Among our European allies, she kept the course.

In the fight against terrorism, there can be no weak hearts or partial commitments. Either we confront this problem together, or we will all pay the price of not acting against a growing threat. We must all shoulder the heavy burden of fighting terrorism.

BUSINESS LIABILITY INSURANCE CRISIS

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. DREIER. Mr. Speaker, today there exists an acute crisis in the availability and affordability of liability insurance for businesses and municipalities throughout the country. In fact, most of the State conferences leading to the 1986 White House Conference on Small Business cited the liability insurance crisis as the most threatening to the continued well-being of our economy. The crisis is so encompassing that it has been the focus of major media coverage in recent months.

The extent to which the lack of available and affordable liability insurance has damaged the economy underlies the need for immediate Government action, both at the State and Federal level. In the last 2 years alone, liability insurance premiums have increased by 50 to 900 percent. Between 1974 and 1984, the number of product liability suits filed in U.S. district courts increased from under 2 million to almost 11 million. The number of million dollar awards for compensatory and punitive damages in liability suits increased from under 50 in 1977 to over 400 in 1984.

As a result, thousands of companies are abandoning their lines of business, operating without insurance, or increasing the prices of their products to cover insurance premium costs. Municipalities fare no better. Many competent and effective city officials are second-guessing their decisions to seek municipal positions out of fear of being sued. In California alone, as many as half of the cities will function without liability insurance coverage should nothing be done to address the current crisis.

Unfortunately, the origin of the current liability insurance crisis is undetermined. Some critics blame the tort justice system, particularly the principle of joint and several liability and the increase, during the last 10 years, in the number of negligence lawsuits and the amount of the awards made in connection with those lawsuits. Others view the accounting and management decisions of insurance companies over the past decade, and the unstable cyclical nature of the industry, as being responsible for the crisis.

In response, Mr. Speaker, to this uncertainty, I am today introducing legislation to establish a commission on the liability insurance crisis. As you know, the collection of data to determine the cause of, and suggest a solution to, the liability insurance dilemma poses significant difficulties. The Commission I am proposing would examine the system of tort law in the United States, and the financial structure of the insurance industry. The commission would consist of representatives of industry, Government, and consumer groups, who would be appointed jointly by the President, the Speaker of the House, and the majority leader of the Senate.

The commission would provide Congress, the President, and State governments with a list of recommendations for resolving the crisis in the availability and affordability of liability insurance. Such a commission would not require any appropriated money from the taxpayers. It would draw upon the existing resources of the Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, the current liability insurance crisis warrants immediate action. I believe my proposal offers the best vehicle to determine what legitimate actions can be taken at all levels of government to address this crisis. I urge my colleagues to consider the merits of this legislation, and join me in moving forward to solve what is potentially one of the most critical dilemmas to face business and municipalities nationwide.

TRIBUTE TO J. ELLIS WOOD

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the U.S. Congress the outstanding achievements of Mr. J. Ellis Wood, who is being honored on June 25, 1986, at a surprise testimonial dinner hosted by his family and friends for his service to the Sunbury Community Hospital and his lifetime of accomplishments.

J. Ellis Wood will soon retire from the Sunbury Community Hospital where he has served as its administrator for more than three decades. Mr. Wood began his hospital service in 1950 on the administrative staff at Good Samaritan Hospital in Lebanon, PA. It was only 2 years later than he came to the Sunbury community to assume the position of hospital administrator; a position he has held to this day.

He has been associated with a number of organizations including the American Hospital Association, the Hospital Association of Pennsylvania, the Central Pennsylvania Health Systems Agency, Blue Cross of Pennsylvania and is a life member of the American College of Hospital Administrators. Mr. Wood has also devoted his time to the SUN Home Health Services, the United Methodist Homes and Danville Area School District School of Practical Nursing.

Accomplishing all of these activities would seem to be enough to satisfy most of us in a lifetime, but for J. Ellis Wood the list of involvement goes beyond his service to the Sunbury Community Hospital. He is also a member of the Sunbury Rotary Club and St. John's Methodist Church.

The Sunbury community has experienced great progress over the years under Mr. Wood's leadership. Aside from keeping Sunbury Community Hospital financially sound during his entire tenure, which he would attribute to Sunbury's strong community support, he has maintained the hospital's accreditation from the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals since 1954. He also oversaw a $1.3 million expansion of the emergency department and a new three story wing in 1968.

I wish to extend my congratulations to Mr. Wood for his remarkable efforts to the Sunbury Community Hospital and his community. He has truly enriched the lives of all who have been privileged to know him and work with him over the years.

A BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF RICHARD F. WALSH OF QUINCY, MA

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing relief legislation today for a constituent, Richard F. Walsh of Quincy, MA. The bill seeks to remedy an unintended injustice which has prevented Mr. Walsh from receiving military decorations due him for heroic actions in the Army Air Force during World War II. The bill would allow the President to award Mr. Walsh the Distinguished Flying Cross and the Purple Heart. Through no fault of my constituent, records that existed during the war which provided evidence of Mr. Walsh's extraordinary heroism in midair on April 30, 1944, and his combat injury sustained on July 4, 1944, were lost, probably during transport back to the States, Mr. Walsh has exhausted every available procedural avenue to seek redress in this matter. I have been honored to assist Mr. Walsh over the last several years in his communications with various Defense Department and record archive officials and offices. While Mr. Walsh's military personnel files were almost completely lost, he has tirelessly compiled pertinent letters from former crewmates and from the Veterans Administration which corroborate his claims. I know Richard F. Walsh to be an honorable and civic minded citizen. I hope the introduction of this relief legislation will begin the process of gaining for him the World War II medals he sincerely deserves. I urge swift consideraton of this legislation.

MR. AND MRS. HILUTE ERSKINE McKINNEY CELEBRATE THEIR 66TH WEDDING ANNIVERSARY

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, in these days so much of the news we hear is bad, it is sometimes wise to take time to recognize a happy event. One such event will be taking place next Friday, April 25, when Ellen Everette McKinney and Hilute Erskine McKinney of St. Louis, MO, will celebrate their 66th wedding anniversary. One of Mr. and Mrs. McKinney's 34 granchildren, Sarah McKinney-Ludd, lives in my congressional district. She tells me that Mr. and Mrs. McKinney say they are more in love than they were on the day they were married. What's more, Mr. and Mrs. McKinney have known each other since they were 8 years old.

What is the secret to this long friendship and happy marriage? Not only have the McKinneys raised a famly of 8 children, 34 grandchildren, 46 great-grandchildren and 7 great-great-grandchildren, but they have been very active in their community as well. Both still teach Sunday school regularly. Mr. McKinney has been a Sunday school superintendent and choir director for most of his adult life. Mrs. McKinney is a former public school teacher.

The McKinney's accomplishments have not gone unheralded. They have received recognitions from our colleague, Congressman BILL CLAY, from the Missouri House of Delegates, from Mayor Vincent C. Schoemel, and from numerous papers in St. Louis. Mrs. McKinney has been named "Outstanding Mother of the Year." Mr. McKinney has been named "Outstanding Role Model." Jointly they have received the Grandmother and Grandfather of the Year Award.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my colleagues will want to join me in sending our congratulations and best wishes to two fine citizens on this special anniversary.

COMMENDING CALIFORNIA STATE UNIVERSITY, DOMINGUEZ HILLS, UPON ITS 25TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting for the RECORD a resolution.

COMMENDING CALIFORNIA STATE UNIVERSITY, DOMINGUEZ HILLS UPON ITS 25TH ANNIVERSARY.

Whereas, in 1960 the California State College, Dominguez Hills was authorized; and

Whereas, in 1977 the name of California State College, Dominguez Hills was changed to California State University, Dominguez Hills; and

Whereas, through the years California State, Dominguez Hills has served the needs of the South Bay area, one of the Nation's most diverse socioeconomic and cultural communities; and

Whereas, 1986 marks the 25th Anniversary of California State University, Dominiguez Hills, and so it is appropriate that it receives special congratulations and commendations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved on this day, April 19, 1986, that California State University, Dominguez Hills receive special congratulations and commendations on such 25th Anniversary.

THE VIETNAM VETERANS READJUSTMENT COUNSELING AMENDMENTS OF 1986

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a bill with two provisions which would have the effect of improving the Vietnam veteran readjustment counseling program.

The first provision would delete the requirement that, by October 1, 1988, readjustment counseling services be provided in VA medical facilities. As you know, readjustment counseling services are currently being provided in facilities that are separate from other VA medical facilities.

What does this provision really mean? It does not mean that vet centers at separate locations will be permanent. If that were the intent, I would not have acted at this time. What this provision means is that the VA will not have to devote time and energy to planning and executing the closure of all vet centers. It means that the VA can selectively keep open those vet centers that are located in areas of need. It means that the VA can manage more flexibly.

I should note here, Mr. Speaker, that last year the Congress removed the arbitrary limit on when veterans could request counseling. It only makes sense that flexibility should be given the VA to fulfill that mandate.

The recent recommendation by the chief medical director's vet center planning committee has recommended this provision and has also recommended a gradual decline in the number of vet centers. In addition, representatives from the major veterans organizations who serve on the agency's advisory committee on Vietnam veterans have voted support for this proposal and there is no opposition among them.

Let me stress that this provision is only intended as a management tool for the VA to make rational decisions based on needs of the readjustment counseling program and the location of counseling services delivery and in order to avoid arbitrary legislative restrictions.

The second provision related to Vietnam veterans is the establishment of a readjustment counseling professional fellowship program. Eligibility for this program would be for Vietnam era veterans who are accepted for study in a post-baccalaureate program in an accredited educational institution and in a field related to the provision of readjustment counseling services.

In exchange for payment of fellowship support, the veterans would sign a written agreement to accept a position as a readjustment counselor with the Veterans Administration for 2 years after completion of the course of training.

There are several advantages to this program:

First, it would allow current vet center counselors to obtain academic training to augment their experience.

Second, for veterans who have not been directly involved in readjustment counseling, it would be an opportunity to gain knowledge and training.

Third, the "payback" provision would ensure an adequate number of trained Vietnam Veterans to provide readjustment counseling and to reinforce the successes that have been produced by the vet center program in treating readjustment problems.

I am pleased to introduce this legislation and encourage all of my colleagues in this body, especially the members of the veterans' affairs subcommittee on hospitals and health care, which I chair, to support it.

FUTURES TRADING ACT OF 1986

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, today, I along with Mr. MADIGAN, Mr. JONES of Tennessee, and Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri introduced the Futures Trading Act of 1986. This bill will reauthorize appropriations to carry out the regulatory program under the Commodity Exchange Act, and make several technical improvements to that act. The text of the bill follows:

H.R. 4613

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Futures Trading Act of 1986".

FRAUDULENT PRACTICES

SEC. 2. Section 4b of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 6b) is amended by—

(1) striking out "on or subject to the rules of any contract market," in the first sentence;

(2) designating the first sentence as subsection (a) and the second sentence as subsection (b); and

(3) adding, at the end thereof, the following:

"(c) Nothing in this section shall apply to any activity that occurs on a board of trade, exchange, market, or clearinghouse for such board of trade, exchange, or market located outside the United States, its territories, or its possessions involving any contract of sale of a commodity for future delivery that is made, or to be made, on or subject to the rules of such board of trade, exchange, or market.".

EXTRATERRITORIAL SERVICE OF SUBPENAS

SEC. 3. Section 6(b) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 15) is amended by—

(1) inserting "(except as provided in the proviso of the following sentence)" immediately before "may administer oaths and affirmations, subpena witnesses" in the third sentence;

(2) striking out "or any State" in the fourth sentence and inserting in lieu thereof ", any State, or any foreign country or jurisdiction"; and

(3) inserting, immediately before the period at the end of the fourth sentence, a semicolon and "and a subpena issued under this subsection may be served on any person who is not to be found within the territorial jurisdiction of any court of the United States in such manner as the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure prescribe for service of process in a foreign country: Provided, That a subpena to be served on a person outside the territorial jurisdiction of any court of the United States may be issued only on the prior approval of the Commission".

EX PARTE APPOINTMENTS OF TEMPORARY RECEIVERS

SEC. 4. The proviso of the first sentence of section 6c of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 13a-1) is amended by inserting, within the parenthetical phrase immediately before the close parenthesis, a comma and "and other than an order appointing a temporary receiver to administer such restraining order and perform such other duties as the court may consider appropriate".

CERTAIN PROHIBITED TRANSACTIONS

SEC. 5. Section 9(d) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 13(d)) is amended by—

(1) inserting, immediately before the period at the end of the first sentence, the following: "if nonpublic information is used in the investment transaction, if the investment transaction is prohibited by rule or regulation of the Commission, or if the investment transaction is effected by means of any instrument regulated by the Commission"; and

(2) striking out the second and third sentences and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The foregoing prohibitions shall not apply to any transaction or class of transactions that the Commission, by rule or regulation, has determined would not be contrary to the public interest or otherwise inconsistent with the purposes of this section.".

REAUTHORIZATION

SEC. 6. Effective October 1, 1986, Section 12(d) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 16(d)) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) There hereby are authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of this Act such sums as may be required for each of the fiscal years during the period beginning October 1, 1986, and ending September 30, 1989.".

REGISTERED FUTURES ASSOCIATION DISCLIPLINARY ACTIONS AND MEMBERSHIP RESTRICTIONS

SEC. 7. Subsections (h) and (i) of section 17 of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 21 (h) and (i)) are amended to read as follows:

"(h)(1) If any registered futures association takes any final disciplinary action against a member thereof or a person associated with a member, or denies admission to any person seeking membership therein or bars any person from being associated with a member, the association promptly shall file notice thereof with the Commission. The notice shall be in such form and contain such information as the Commission, by rule, may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in furtherance of the purposes of this Act.

"(2) Any action with respect to which a registered futures association is required by paragraph (1) of this subsection to file notice shall be subject to review by the Commission on its motion, or on application by any person aggrieved thereby. Such application must be filed within thirty days after the date such notice was filed with the Commission and received by the aggrieved person, or within such longer period as the Commission may determine.

"(3) Application to the Commission for review, or the institution of review by the Commission on its own motion, shall not operate as a stay of such action unless the Commission otherwise orders, summarily or after notice and opportunity for hearing on the question of a stay (which hearing may consist solely of the submission of affidavits or presentation of oral arguments). The Commission shall establish standards for an expedited procedure for consideration and determination of the question of a stay.

"(i)(1) In a proceeding to review a final disciplinary action taken by a registered futures association against a member thereof or a person associated with a member, after appropriate notice and opportunity for a hearing (which hearing may consist solely of consideration of the record before the association and opportunity for the presentation of supporting reasons to affirm, modify, or set aside the sanction imposed by the association)—

"(A) if the Commission finds that (i) such member or person associated with a member has engaged in the acts or practices, or has omitted the acts, that the association has found the member or person to have engaged in or omitted; (ii) the acts or practices, or omissions to act, are in violation of the rules of the association specified in the determination of the association; and (iii)

such rules are, and were applied in a manner, consistent with the purposes of this Act, the Commission, by order, shall so declare and, as appropirate, affirm the sanction imposed by the association, modify the sanction in accordance with paragraph (2) of this subsection, or remand the case to the association for further proceedings; or

"(B) if the Commission does not make any such finding, it shall set aside, by order, the sanction imposed by the association and, if appropriate, remand the case to the association for further proceedings.

"(2) If after a proceeding in accordance with paragraph (1) of this subsection, the Commission finds that any penalty imposed on a member or person associated with a member is excessive or oppressive, having due regard for the public interest, the Commission, by order, shall cancel, reduce, or require the remission of the penalty.

"(3) In any proceeding to review the denial of membership in a registered futures association or the barring of any person from being associated with a member, after appropriate notice and hearing (which hearing may consist solely of consideration of the record before the association and opportunity for the presentation of supporting reasons to affirm, modify, or set aside the sanction imposed by association)—

"(A) if the Commission finds that (i) the specific grounds on which the denial or bar is based exist in fact, (ii) the denial or bar is in accordance with the rules of the association, and (iii) such rules are, and were applied in a manner, consistent with the purposes of this Act, the Commission, by order, shall dismiss the proceeding; or

"(B) if the Commission does not make any such finding, it shall set aside, by order, the sanction imposed by the association and require it to admit the applicant to membership therein, or permit the person to be associated with a member.

"(4) Any person (other than a registered futures association) aggrieved by a final order of the Commission entered under the provisions of this subsection may file a petition for review with a United States court of appeals in accordance with section 6(b) of this Act.".

REGISTERED FUTURES ASSOCIATION RULES

SEC. 8. (a) Section 17(j) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 21(j)) is amended by striking out the third sentences.

(b) Section 17(k) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 21(k)) is amended by—

(1) striking out "title" in paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof "section"; and

(2) striking out the second sentence of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "If such association fails to adopt such alteration or supplement within a reasonable time, the Commission, by order, may alter or supplement the rules of such association in the manner theretofore requested, or with such modification of such alteration or supplement as it deems necessary, if, after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, it appears to the Commission that such alteration or supplement is necessary or appropriate in the public interest to ensure fair dealing by the members of such association or to ensure a fair representation of its members in the administration of its affairs, or to effectuate the purposes of this section. Such alterations or supplements may specify changes with respect to such matters as—

"(A) the basis for, and procedure in connection with, the denial of membership or the barring from being associated with a member or the disciplining of members or persons associated with members, or the qualifications required for members or individuals associated with members or any class thereof;

"(B) the method of adoption of any change in or addition to the rules of the association;

"(C) the method of choosing officers and directors;

"(D) safeguards with respect to the financial responsibility of members;

"(E) the manner, method, and place of soliciting business by members, including the content of such solicitations; and

"(F) the form and manner of handling, recording, and accounting for customer orders, transactions, and accounts by members.".

WINNING ESSAYS

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I recently conducted my annual Sixth District Congressional Essay Contest for junior and senior high school students in my district, and I am very pleased to announce the winners today.

The first place winner in the senior high category is Michael Lubelfeld, a resident of Des Plaines, who attends Maine Township High School East in Park Ridge.

The first place winner in the junior high category is Mary Ellen Ford, a resident of Park Ridge who attends Mary, Seat of Wisdom School in Park Ridge.

I congratulate both Mr. Lubelfeld and Miss Ford for their outstanding essays, which are included in the RECORD following my statement. I also want to thank the hundreds of other students who submitted entries; I wish that I could publish them all as there were so many excellent submissions.

I'm most pleased to share the winning essays with my colleagues:

THE EUROPEANIZATION OF AMERICA

(By Michael Lubelfeld)

Our world is diverse in many ways, especially the way in which we govern ourselves. The government of the United States of America has grown and changed throughout the years in many different areas, but its basic foundation has stayed the same: the United States Constitution. The United States, with its republican form of government, has been governed by that document for over two hundred years. Other countries, for example, the democratic countries of Israel, Canada, Japan and those in western Europe, also have constitutions, but they have parliamentary governments. This paper will focus on the differences in democracy between the parliamentary system and the United States system.

Parliamentary government is set up somewhat like the United States government. Both types of government consist of three branches of government; the executive, legislative and judicial. The difference between the two types of government is in how each branch carries out its various duties. Although both types of government are structurally similar, theoretical differences do exist.

In the parliamentary system, the executive branch of government consists of the Prime Minister and the cabinet. The Prime Minister is the head of government and also head of the political party that he belongs to. The head of state is a largely ceremonial position. The head of state in the parliamentary system is comparable to the Vice-President in the United States.

In many of these countries, the Prime Minister is chosen by the head of state. The Prime Minister is not directly elected by the people. The person holding that honored position is selected by the political party in control of the government. The Legislative branch of a Parliamentary government, also similar to the United States, usually has a bicameral legislature. In England, the upper house is not elected by the people, but rather is controlled by families that have had ancestors who made a notable contribution to Britain. Knighthood and feudal tradition still provide a basis of operation among the members of the upperhouse. Our upper house, somewhat more aloof than the House politically, still is based on popular government rather than heriditary rule. However, in almost all of these governments, the lower house members are elected directly by the people.

One exception to a bicameral legislature is Israel. In Israel, its Legislative body, the Knesset, is unicameral. The Knesset is directly elected by secret ballot by the people of Israel.

The Judicial systems in these governments are also similar. Both Parliamentary and United States Judicial systems consist of inferior and superior courts. A significant difference, though, is that the United States Supreme Court has the power of judicial review. This means that the Supreme Court can determine that actions by the other branches of government officials are unconstitutional, thereby null and void. The House of Lords in Britain serves as the equivalent to our Supreme Court.

In the United States, the President and Vice-President are elected indirectly by the Electoral College. The legislative branch, which consists of two houses, is elected directly by the people.

A unique quality of the United States government is its system of checks and balances. This system allows all three branches to work separately, but always able to check one of the others' work and therefore maintain a balance of power within the government. This system is not used in the Parliamentary governments.

The United States government is much more stable than the parliamentary form. Prime Ministers may lose control of the government should parliament fail to provide a vote of confidence in their leadership during a national crisis. A prime minister may hold power for twenty-four hours, twenty-four days or, after several elections, twenty-four years. In other words, a Prime Minister's power to rule depends on constant approval of their policies by Parliament. On the other hand, in the United States, regardless of crisis, the President is in control, still able to exercise his constitutional duties. This system provides stability, greater flexibility, and a more secure government. Just prior to World War II, the government of Neville Chamberlain (in Britain) had a policy of appeasement towards Hitler. Soon after, Hitler was dominating all of Europe, German bombs fell on Britain and so did Chamberlain's government. Chamberlain failed to obtain a vote of confidence from Parliament and he was out of office. Whereas, if President Roosevelt made a questionable decision, there would not have been a new government, but the President would have had a chance to correct his mistake. Recently in England, Prime Minister Thatcher's government was faced with a very major problem, the nation's coal miners were on strike. Mrs. Thatcher, had she not received support of parliament, could have lost her power from something as mundane as a coal miners' strike. In the United States, with our more stable system, if there is a strike that shuts down a significant supply of important resources to the American people, the government could not collapse—no matter how serious the problem.

Another interesting difference between these two governments, is the role of political parties. Political parties play key roles in government. In the United States, there are two major parties, with many other minor parties. The citizens of the United States elect the people running for office directly, regardless of what party affiliation they have. Whereas in a parliamentary system, the party plays a much larger role. In effect, with the parliament system, political parties, not people, are what is being elected. The people elect a party in the lower house (of Legislature) and whichever party receives the majority of votes, is called the majority party. The prime minister is then selected by the majority party. When the prime minister's party loses majority, the government is dissolved.

A very common question is this: should the United States of America adopt a parliamentary form of government? The United States government is entirely elected by the people, to govern for the people, so the people's directly wishes can and will be carried out at every level of government. The parliamentary government evolved from the old fashioned ideas of monarchy. A parliamentary system would contradict the principles of the United States' constitutional government. The American people pride themselves in the form of government that they have. In the parliamentary form the upper house is made up of elite appointed or hereditary officials who can do whatever they wish and whatever their parties wish. However, in this country, the legislators of both houses represent all of the wishes and ideas of the people who they represent.

Parliamentary government in the United States would be detrimental and contradictory to the principles of the Constitution. The Constitution was set up so that the government would always have to respond to the peoples' needs through the check and balance system. The citizens of the United States of America are very unique and diverse and they have learned to accept and respect this form of government that has been around since the independence of the country. Freedom to elect all public officials, to question policies and to change the policies is every American's right. American people would not accept the idea of the Parliamentary government.

HOW DEMANDING IS LIBERTY?

Is it any more demanding to be a citizen of a country that follows the form of government called Democracy than to be a citizen in a Totalitarian State?

Democracy is a form of government that gains its power directly and indirectly from the people through a system of representation. It is a system that operates "through the consent of the governed".[1]

Totalitarianism is a political concept whereby the citizens of a state are totally subjected to an absolute authority. The rulers have unlimited power.

To be a citizen of a country advocating either democracy or totalitarianism usually means you are a person who resides or inhabits that country and is one who gives allegiance to that country. However, being a good citizen doesn't stop there. Citizenship also brings along responsibilities.

Let's compare a citizen of the Soviet Union who lives with totalitarianism with a citizen of the United States of America who experiences democracy. Both would give allegiance to the country they reside in and would be able to demand protection from their country.

The citizen of the Soviet Union is answerable to someone in higher authority in every aspect of his life. He is dependent on the wishes and whims of the political party and its leaders. His life is determined for him as far as his occupation, his education, and his social affairs. All are coordinated to serve the purpose of the "party".

There is no friendly competition. Everything done is done "for the good of the party".

The Soviet citizen is manipulated through the government's absolute control of mass communication, the secret-police, a monopoly of all weapons, and a certainly controlled economy. This citizen is not asked to question anything. He is praised if he turns in a neighbor, parent, child, or co-worker if he witnesses them acting independently.

Work permits are issued to citizens who behave. If the worker would complain of foul working conditions, the permit would be taken away and that would mean virtual death for the worker and his family.

The responsibility of this citizen of totalitarianism is to obey without question for the sake of the state. The citizen may be compared to a child who is taken care of by a parent. If the child-citizen asks "why", he is told "because I say so". If he would ask "why" too often, the punishment gets to be so severe that he no longer wants to question. It must be a very difficult life to want to ask questions and get no answers.

A citizen of the United States of America is free because many years ago people were told to obey and dared to ask "why". They did something about it. The Constitution of the United States guarantees this citizen freedom to choose. This citizen has rights that the government declares and enforces:

The right to worship as he chooses;

The right to express opinions through voice and media;

The right to live and work where he wishes;

The right to urge the government to correct injustices;

The right to a speedy trial if necessary;

The right to assemble peaceably;

The right to bear arms to protect his belongings;

The right to be free from unlawful searches of his property.

Every American citizen has these rights and the responsibility to be aware and informed of the kind of people he or she elects into government. Every person has the right to choose how they will live as long as they respect the rights of others.

The government of the United States gets its power from the people. The leaders are answerable to the citizens.

The people keep the elected officials honest. Three branches of the government insure that no one person or group has absolute power through a special system of checks and balances.

Obedience through fear as with totalitarianism is not obedience. It is intimidation. Citizens must become very undemanding if they wish to survive in such a place.

Citizens of a totalitarian state must meet the demands of the government.

The government of a democracy must meet the demands of the citizens.

Is it, then, any more demanding to be a citizen of totalitarianism than it is to be a citizen of democracy? I feel this way: No matter which country you live in, no matter which policy you live with, if you are a person of conscience both citizenships can be most demanding.

The United States citizen will try to maintain freedom through being a responsible citizen. The Soviet citizen who has a conscience and wants a better life must live with the demanding pressure of loyalty to his country while maintaining integrity.

However, if you take a person in America who doen't take his civic responsibility to heart and walks through life as a zombie . . . his life is an undemanding as the totalitarian citizen who chooses to walk through life as a zombie.

The answer to the question is as different as each person is different—as each person's conscience is different.

TRIBUTE TO GEORGE W. STRICK

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, next week, a very good friend of mine and of working men and women from all over America, George Strick, will retire from his position on the executive board of the Communications Workers of America. He will be ending over a quarter-century of service to the CWA, half of which has been spent as vice president of district 2 in Washington, DC.

George has been a progressive pioneer and union builder for the Communications Workers since serving as CWA representative in Kansas City, his hometown, beginning in 1960.

Before joining the CWA, George wcrked for Southwestern Bell beginning in 1946 after distinguished service in the U.S. Army during the Second World War.

Since coming to Washington, DC, in 1965, George has been very active in local charities and community activities including service on the board of directors of the United Way.

I first got to know George as a freshman Member of Congress in 1977 and he was kind enough to help guide me around and through the ways of Capitol Hill. Since that time he has been a great friend and a man on whom I could always rely.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all my colleagues who know and admire George Strick as I do, I wish him a happy, healthy and well-deserved retirement. The Communications Workers of America, the American labor movement, and the U.S. Congress are all very grateful to George Strick for a job well done.

CONGRESS MUST KEEP ORIGINAL GOALS IN MIND

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, how can it be that over 4 months have passed since the endorsement and approval of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings legislation to eliminate Federal deficit spending, and yet the development of the fiscal year 1987 budget remains in its most preliminary stages? The passage of the April 15 deadline for final congressional action of a budget resolution has not gone unnoticed and, in fact, is a warning sign, and a cause for great concern.

As a nation, we carry a tremendous budget deficit and an overwhelming collective debt. Our interest payments alone speak to the magnitude of the problem; we are currently servicing our debt at a rate which consumes 15 percent of our budget. Last December 11, we admitted this problem, and put into place a mechanism to force Congress into making the decisions necessary to reduce deficit spending. And yet, here we are, without a budget plan for next year, despite the threat of automatic spending cuts. I am hearing from many Mainers who rely upon such programs as Meals-on-Wheels, who are struggling to obtain a higher education, who do not have an income sufficient to afford home heating; the message which they send me is that a 4.3-percent cut was quite a burden to bear, but the devastation which deeper, indiscriminate cuts would cause is unthinkable.

With the passage of Tuesday's deadline, I am concerned that we have forgotten the implications of our inaction. I am concerned that we are not making the decisions that we were sent here to make. I urge my colleagues to keep our original goals in mind, and to not lose sight of the consequences which will be set into motion should we fail to meet our responsibilities.

CONGRESS MUST ACT TO INCREASE LIMIT ON FHA AND VA MORTGAGES

HON. THOMAS J. MANTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, the recent decline in home mortgage rates is a welcome development. Mortgage rates are at their lowest levels since the late seventies. More and more Americans are finding it possible to afford a new home. Furthermore, millions of existing homeowners are rushing to refinance double-digit mortgages at today's lower rates.

This rush of activity has pushed the Government National Mortgage Association [GNMA] to the limit on the volume of mortgage-backed securities it can guarantee. In addition, FHA is nearing the limit on the volume of mortgages it can insure.

Mr. Speaker, FHA and VA mortgages are commonly sold on the secondary mortgage market. In order to generate new mortgage funds, GNMA, created by the Federal Government to facilitate the growth of the secondary market, guarantees privately issued securities backed by pools of FHA and VA loans. However, Ginnie Mae is limited on the volume of securities it can insure. On April 7, Ginnie Mae reached its 1986 limit of $65.3 billion.

Congress must act p omptly to extend this limit. In addition, action must be taken to prevent an interruption in FHA mortgage insurance operations. I have cosponsored legislation, H.R. 4602, that increases the limitation on the amount loans FHA can insure from $57.4 billion to $95 billion and increases the limitation on the amount of mortgage-backed securities GNMA can guarantee.

Without action, FHA- and VA-insured mortgages will either disappear or prove too costly for most buyers. Congress must not allow that to happen at a time when millions of young families are finding homeownership affordable for the first time in many years.

Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that Congress will act soon to resolve this pending crisis. We must make certain all Americans are given an opportunity to reap the benefit of today's falling mortgage rates.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO JIM NELSON

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, today I have the distinct honor of congratulating Jim Nelson, the creator and director of Operation Santa Claus in my Sacramento, CA, congressional district. Mr. Nelson's dedicated volunteer service has come to the aid of thousands of needy people in Sacramento and worldwide. For his efforts and profound accomplishments, Mr. Nelson will receive the distinguished President's Volunteer Action Award on April 21, 1986.

Jim Nelson's altruistic Operation Santa Claus began in 1948 when, joined by a few civilian employees at the Sacramento Army Depot, he provided a Christmas dinner for two military families who otherwise would have gone hungry. For 29 years this noble holiday tradition continued and flourished.

Realizing that for some people hunger is a year round condition, Mr. Nelson has expanded his philanthropic organization. For the past 8 years, Operation Santa Claus has served the needy throughout the year by donating over 7,000 boxes of food to the poor each year.

In addition to food, Operation Santa Claus has donated 84 dental units to 22 Arizona Indian reservations, equipment for a community medical center in rural northern California, refurbished bicycles for disadvantaged Sacramento news carriers and provided additional bikes to a southern California orphanage. Their range of services and accomplishments are ever increasing.

Jim Nelson's exemplary organization is not only prepared for day-to-day crisis, but also for unexpected emergencies. For example, when California flood and Mexico earthquake victims needed assistance, Operation Santa Claus was on the spot.

The illustrious achievements of Jim Nelson and his fleet of dedicated volunteers are worthy of praise and admiration. On behalf of the Sacramento community, I commend the dedication and concern of Jim Nelson and his entire staff. Their sincere efforts to aid the needy have earned my highest respect and gratitude.

TRIBUTE TO KYLE "BUCK" MORRIS

HON. W. HENSON MOORE

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to call to your attention a story that not many hear of these days: A story of heroism, a story of a man who gave his own life for the sake and safety of another. This is a story of a private citizen who witnessed a crime and was not going to stand by and let an offender get away. Mr. Kyle "Buck" Morris of Baton Rouge, LA, after witnessing a 14-year-old snatch a purse, chased the youth through the streets of Baton Rouge until the boy stopped, pulled a gun, shot and killed him.

Our President on the occasion of his first inauguration on January 20, 1981, spoke of heroes. He said:

> Those who say we are in a time where there are no heroes: They just don't know where to look . . . they are individuals and families whose taxes support the Government and whose voluntary gifts support church, charity, culture, art and education. Their patriotism is quiet but deep. Their values sustain our national life.

Buck Morris was such a hero as he gave the greatest gift of all because he felt deeply and his values are the highest of our national life.

Mr. Morris leaves a wife, two very young children and an entire city where there is nothing but admiration felt for him. Friends and relatives all remember him as a loyal and honest person who would not tolerate injustice. I admire and commend him for these traits and am heartfully sorry for his death and the loss to his family, friends, and neighbors have endured.

I bring this story to your attention because such extraordinary acts of bravery and our heroes should not go unnoticed. I am certain that the citizens of Baton Rouge will never forget Buck Morris, nor should we.

NEW GI BILL IMPORTANT TO STRONG NATIONAL DEFENSE

HON. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, the Director of the Air National Guard, Maj. Gen.

John B. Conaway, is a strong supporter of the new GI bill. He states in the following letter that 75 percent—4,651—of the Air Guardsmen who enlisted or reenlisted for 6 years during the first 5 months of the new GI bill did so because of this education program.

This phenomenal statistic clearly illustrates the power of the new GI bill as a recruitment and retention tool. The new educational assistance program is already an important component of our national defense, and, contrary to the President's recommendation, it must not be terminated. Guard and Reserve representatives have told me that the termination of this education program will have a widespread negative impact on their recruiting and retention efforts thereby making it far more difficult for the Guard and Reserves to meet end strength in future years.

I ask my colleagues to carefully review General Conaway's remarks and remember them if they are asked to support the President's recommendation to terminate the new GI bill:

DEPARTMENTS OF THE ARMY AND THE AIR FORCE,
NATIONAL GUARD BUREAU,
Washington, DC, February 7, 1986.

Congressman G. V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY,
Federal Building,
Meridian, MS.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MONTGOMERY: In responding to your inquiry concerning the Report to the House and Senate Committees on Armed Services, I again appreciate the opportunity to convey my sincere appreciation for the excellent support you are providing the Air National Guard through your staunch promotion of recruiting and retention incentives. One of these incentives, the New GI Bill (NGIB), is serving us well in attracting and retaining the men and women we need to maintain a strong force. Unfortunately, when the initial input for the Report to the House and Senate Committee on Armed Services was made, we didn't have sufficient data or experience to attribute the NGIB with the credit it deserves.

As of 30 November 1985, the ANG identified 4,651 members who had either enlisted or reenlisted for six years to become eligible for the NGIB entitlements. This represents 75 percent of the total enlistments/reenlistments during the first five months of the program's existence. The NGIB has become one of the most critical force management tools in light of the projected ANG end strength increase of 4,000 personnel each year for FYs 87 and 88.

Unlike the active forces, the ANG does not have a Veterans Educational Assistance Program to fall back on. Since the Educational Assistance bonus was eliminated with the advent of the NGIB, should we lose the NGIB, the end result would be a major force without one of its largest retention/enlistment inducements. If given the time to mature to its full potential, the NGIB could very well surprise us all. Therefore, I strongly support continuation of the NGIB until at least the previously announced termination date of 30 June 1988. Again, thank you for all you've done.

Sincerely,

JOHN B. CONAWAY,
Major General, USAF,
Director, Air National Guard.

THE MEDICARE FAIR HOSPITAL DEDUCTIBLE ACT OF 1986

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, today, I rise to introduce the Medicare Fair Hospital Deductible Act of 1986. This bill will limit increases in the hospital deductible and nursing home coinsurance to no more than the increase in Social Security's COLA—an indicator of the elderly's ability to pay for health care. Nursing home coinsurance will be reduced from one-eighth of the hospital deductible to one-twelfth. Finally, full nursing home coverage will be extended by 5 days to give seniors some relief from the "sooner and sicker" problem of early hospital discharges.

Why is this legislation so critical? Today we were all shocked by the upcoming increase in Medicare's hospital deductible and nursing home coinsurance for 1987. While the increase for 1985 was already an unacceptable 12 percent, no one was prepared for the unreasonable increase of 23 percent that was imposed on the elderly in 1986. Now, as reported in today's Washington Post, this deductible will be increased another 16 percent for 1987. This 16-percent increase is even more excessive when you consider that the Social Security COLA for 1987 may be less than 3 percent. This 1987 increase along with the 1986 increase represents a 43-percent jump in 2 years—seven times higher than the increases in elderly income. This situation is intolerable and requires immediate remedy.

Already many congressional offices are receiving mail from senior citizens who are angry about the massive increase that went into effect January 1 of this year. Soon they will realize that this is only the beginning. If Congress does not act soon, senior citizens entering hospitals after january 1 of next year will face a $572 deductible—$80 higher than it is now. As we all know, the mail will begin to flow and with good reason.

In an April study conducted by the Committee on Aging, we documented that the elderly are already spending more of their income today for health care than when Medicare and Medicaid began nearly 20 years ago. Even without this massive increase in the hospital deductible, the situation was going to get much worse. With a hospital deductible of $572, the elderly are projected to spend $2,633 for health care in 1991—about 18.5 percent of their income. This is substantially higher than the already excessive 16 percent they are paying today.

I believe that the vast majority of my colleagues agree that the elderly are already paying too much out of pocket for health care and that these increases in the hospital deductible and nursing home coinsurance are too much for the elderly to absorb. For this reason, I urge my colleagues to throw their support behind the Medicare Fair Hospital Deductible Act of 1986. Only if this legislation is passed quickly can the Congress protect America's elderly and disabled from being hit with the $80 increase starting in January.

The "Medicare Fair Hospital Deductible Act of 1986" follows:

H.R. 4620

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Medicare Fair Hospital Deductible Act".

SEC. 2. LIMITING RATE OF INCREASE OF PART A INPATIENT HOSPITAL DEDUCTIBLE AND NURSING HOME COINSURANCE.

(a) INPATIENT HOSPITAL DEDUCTIBLE.—Section 1813(b)(2) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395e(b)(2)) is amended—

(1) in the first sentence, by striking "between July 1 and September 15 of 1968, and of each year thereafter" and inserting "not later than November 15 of each year", and

(2) by amending the second sentence to read as follows:

"Such inpatient hospital deductible shall be equal to the lesser of the following:

(A) $45 multiplied by the ratio of (i) the current average per diem rate for inpatient hospital services for the calendar year preceding the promulgation, to (ii) the current average per diem rate for such services for 1966.

(B) The inpatient hospital deductible for services furnished in the preceding year increased by the applicable increase percentage (relating to the annual cost-of-living increase in OASDI benefit payments) determined under section 215(i) in the year of promulgation.".

(b) EXTENDED CARE COINSURANCE AMOUNT.—

(1) APPLICATION BEGINNING ON 25TH DAY OF EXTENDED CARE SERVICES.—Section 1813(a)(3) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1395e(a)(3)) is amended by striking "20" and inserting "25".

(2) REDUCTION TO 1/12TH OF HOSPITAL INSURANCE DEDUCTIBLE.—Such section is further amended—

(A) by striking "one-eighth" and inserting "1/12th", and

(B) by adding at the end the following new sentence: "any amount determined under preceding sentence which is not a multiple of $1 shall be rounded to the nearnest multiple of $1 (or, if it is midway between two multiples of $1, to the next higher multiple of $1).".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) shall apply to—

(A) inpatient hospital services furnished during a spell of illness beginning on or after January 1, 1987,

(B) extended care services furnished on or after January 1, 1987, and

(C) monthly premiums under section 1818 of the Social Security Act for months beginning with January 1987.

(2) NEW DETERMINATION OF INPATIENT HOSPITAL DEDUCTIBLE AND EXTENDED CARE COINSURANCE AMOUNTS.—If this Act is enacted after the date the Secretary of Health and Human Services promulgates, under section 1813(b)(2) of the Social Security Act, an inpatient hospital deductible for 1987, then within 15 days after the date of the enactment of this Act and taking into account the amendments made by this section, the Secretary of Health and Human Services shall redetermine and repromulgate the inpatient hospital deductible (and the extended care coinsurance amount) which will apply for purposes of section 1813(a) of the Social Security Act for inpatient hospital services and extended care services furnished during 1986 and the monthly premium that will apply for purposes of section 1818 of the Social Security Act for months in 1986.

SUPPORT FOR PRESIDENT REAGAN

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, according to the polls reported on television most Americans support President Reagan in his military strike against Libyan terrorists.

Apparently the pollsters asked respondents a number of questions and the television anchors somewhat gleefully report that most Americans do not believe this one strike will end terrorist activities.

Of course no one in the administration, certainly not the President, has ever suggested that this first response to Libyan terrorists would immediately stop all terrorist activities,

The public response seems to indicate the American people are sufficiently sophisticated to recognize that, in the President's words, "We may have to do it again and again."

We all understand that terrorism will not be ended until those who sponsor terrorism are made to understand they will be required to pay a high price for their terrorist activities. This first strike against Libyan terrorist training camps is, in my opinion, a good beginning.

The military operation was a long range, sophisticated, highly technical undertaking. We can all feel proud of our ability to neutralize the Russian missiles which Libya had installed to protect their bases against an aerial attack.

We should also make a point to remember that France refused us permission to fly across their air space and thus extended the length of this operation by perhaps as much as 1,800 miles.

Apparently the French would rather appease the terrorists. When I recall what we did in 1917 and 1918 and again in 1941 to 1945 to protect the French and rescue them from the German Imperialist government and second from Hitler's Nazi government, I am offended by the refusal of the present rulers of France to grant us permission to overfly their air space.

I would suggest to my fellow Members of Congress that the next time France comes to us for help, military or economic, we remember their refusal to join with us in this world struggle against terrorism.

This French refusal to cooperate and permit us to shorten the flying route placed a very heavy burden on our pilots and crews, and may have contributed to the failure of our one F-111 to return safely.

We can expect there will be more terrorist attacks on Americans and American interests.

President Reagan has served notice that the sponsors of terrorism can expect an immediate response from the United States and we can believe that the next time more targets will be hit, destruction will be greater.

We have sent a clear message to all our allies that the United States will not appease the terrorists.

APRIL 15 WAS A DAY OF DEADLINES

HON. DAN SCHAEFER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. SCHAEFER. Mr. Speaker, we in Congress are indeed privileged. Last December, with passage of Gramm-Rudman, we established a series of deadlines for all of America to live by. OMB, CBO, and GAO were forced to abide by the provisions of the law. The President of the United States met his deadline. The American people accepted their March 1 sequestration. Yet Congress, the very body that formulated this timetable, has determined that it is above compliance with the law. The April 15 deadline for a Congressional budget resolution has come and gone without even a proposal from the majority party in the House.

And yes, we'll hear excuses from the other side of the aisle, claiming that the Gramm-Rudman timetable is not realistic. Yet there was more than enough time to criticize the President's budget—both here on the floor and across the country. In fact, there was so much time that the majority party deemed it necessary that the House meet only 27 of the 68 days since the President submitted his budget. But somehow, all this time suddenly ran out. And with it is running the patience of our constituents.

April 15 was a day of deadlines. The vast majority of the American people met theirs—Congress did not. But then, we in this body play by different rules. We make the laws, we don't have to abide by them. Thank you Mr. Speaker.

GO SOUTH YOUNG MAN

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, Argentine President Raul Alfonsin delivered a major televised address last night calling for constitutional changes in order to establish a more parliamentary form of government and proposing to move the Nation's capitol from Buenos Aires to northern Patagonia.

While moving the capitol might strike some as needlessly symbolic, I think it would have a positive, catalytic effect on the Argentine people.

The country has suffered from a frontier, Patagonia without a frontier spirit. Moving the capitol south into Patagonia would promote that spirit.

The move of Brazil's capitol from Rio de Janeiro to Brasilia sparked a renewal of frontier spirit in that country.

Likewise with our young country when Congress voted in 1790 to move the capitol to the banks of the Potomac.

I commend President Alfonsin for his vision.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 16, 1986]

ARGENTINE LEADER PROPOSES MOVING CAPITAL TO PATAGONIA—ALFONSIN ALSO URGES CONSTITUTIONAL REFORMS

(By Bradley Graham)

BUENOS AIRES.—In his most ambitious initiative since leading Argentina's return to democracy more than two years ago, President Raul Alfonsin has proposed moving the nation's capital from Buenos Aires to the vast, sparsely settled region of Patagonia to serve as both symbol and impetus for the creation of "a second republic."

The Argentine leader coupled this startling proposal, delivered in a nationally televised address last night, with a call for constitutional reform that would strenghten congressional powers and establish a new balance between president and parliament patterned more after European models than the U.S. one.

He also spoke of the need to modernize public administration and perfect the judicial system to make it "more efficient, agile and accessible to all sectors of society."

The speech was praised here today as bold and imaginative. But many Argentines also said they doubted the transfer plan ever would take place.

Opposition leaders said the presidential project was meant as a political diversion and called it inopportune given Argentina's weak economic condition and other more urgent concerns.

Alfonsin offered no timetable for the move, which requires congressional approval, nor any suggestion of how Argentina, already struggling to cover a $50 billion foreign debt, would pay for it.

Past Argentine governments have studied the feasibility of relocating the capital to decentralize the nation's political structure and reduce the influence of Buenos Aires. The metropolitan area has a population of more than 10 million and today contains 35 percent of the country's population, consumes 39 percent of its energy and employs 48 percent of all industrial workers and 45 percent of all commerce and service workers.

Nothing came of the earlier studies, the last one of which was commissioned in 1972 under military rule.

Alfonsin said the growth of Buenos Aires into "an excessive megalopolis" has paralyzed and distorted the strength of the whole nation, "destroying the foundations of federalism."

He suggested that a new capital be built at the northern edge of Patagonia in an area currently encompassing two towns—Viedma in the province of Rio Negro and Carmen de Patagones in the province of Buenos Aires.

The two towns, which lie opposite each other across the Rio Negro, have a combined population of about 50,000 and are located about 500 miles south of Buenos Aires.

As for what would become of Buenos Aires, Alfonsin pointed to the example of Rio de Janeiro, which has remained a commercial, cultural and tourist hub of Brazil despite the construction of Brasilia, which became the capital in 1960.

THE COOPERATIVE EXTENSION SERVICE AND THE FUTURE OF AMERICAN FARMING

HON. BILL SCHUETTE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend to my colleagues, and to all those interested in the future of American agriculture, an article by Mr. Dan Rossman which appeared in the March 26, 1986, issue of the Gratiot County, MI, Herald.

Mr. Rossman, the Gratiot County agriculture agent, reviews some of the factors that have led to the present-day farm crisis—inflation, the grain embargo, the high U.S. dollar, increased interest rates—factors for which the American farmer cannot be blamed.

But more important than Mr. Rossman's review of how American farming arrived at its current crisis situation is his outlook for the future: Efforts to bring down the deficit, falling interest rates, declining oil prices, and a dollar whose value makes U.S. products once again competitive on world markets. All these are good signs for the American farmer. I urge my colleagues to give special attention to Mr. Rossman's discussion of the often vital assistance the Cooperative Extension Service provides to the American farmer in helping him, both financially and emotionally, through the current farming crisis. The Cooperative Extension Service has been helping American farmers and their families and today its services are needed more than ever. I am currently cosponsoring a resolution calling on the administration to give a higher priority in its budget considerations to the Cooperative Extension Service. I ask my colleagues to read Mr. Rossman's article, and join me in supporting the continued funding of the Cooperative Extension Service. The article follows:

[From The Gratiot County (MI) Herald, Mar. 26, 1986]

I BELIEVE IN THE FUTURE OF FARMING . . . OR DO I?

(By Dan Rossman, Gratiot Ag. Agent)

DEVELOPMENT OF A CRISIS

The farm situation is dismal.

Negative attitudes are expressed everywhere. The coffee shops, farm magazines, local newspapers, 6 o'clock news and even the theatres are portraying farm families as down and out, about ready to lose their farms.

Just six years ago argiculture was booming. Farm land was considered to be an excellent investment. Parents could hardly expand their operations fast enough to "make room" for their children to join them. Young people looked forward to prosperous careers in agriculture.

The situation has changed. Farming no longer looks profitable. Both parents and children are questioning whether they really believe in the future of farming. Thorough review of the key events which set the stage for today's farming crisis is needed to accurately assess whether there is a future in farming.

Major changes will take place in agriculture. The Cooperative Extension Serivce will play an increasingly more vital role in helping the farm community and families through the transition. The value of the U.S. dollar, export levels, real interest rates, oil prices, the farm policy, U.S. deficit spending and other administration decision have affected the course of American agriculture.

The value of the U.S. dollar dropped at a steady pace throughout the 1970's. Each year American agricultural commodities cost foreign buyers less; consequently, the volume of United States exports rose from about 63 million metric tons per year to a high of 165 million metric tons in 1980. The world demand for U.S. food seemed endless. Some predicted that production would have a hard time keeping pace with the growing demands of a hungry world.

Real interest rates (interest on borrowed money minus inflation) were between 2 percent and 4 percent throughout the 1950's, 1960's, and early 1970's. In the early 1970's oil prices rose substantially. The U.S. money supply was increased. Inflation sky-rocketed. Real interest rates dropped to zero and even lower levels. During the mid 1970's a farmer could buy a tractor and sell it 4 years later for more than be paid for it. Land was appreciating in value, doubling and even tripling in price in some areas. Net farm income rose steadily in the 1970's to an all time high in 1979.

By 1980 farmers had enjoyed unprecedented borrowing power through their inflated land prices. Many had an excellent cash flow due to their high net incomes. The world was demanding their commodities. Prosperity was at the farm. Farmers responded by going all out. Hills and pastures were torn up and planted. Equipment was traded off and replaced with the biggest and the best. Land was bid up even higher. All the farmer had to do was sign his name, and the debt was his.

However, 1980 was also the turning point. The grain embargo with Russia combined with earlier embargo's in 1973, 1974, and 1975 gave foreign countries the sign that the United States was not a reliable food supplier. Foreign countries took steps to become more self-sufficient. Others invested in and began to buy from new agricultural production areas, such as Brazil. The Reagan administration took measures to tighten the monetary policy to control inflation. Inflation slowed, and the U.S. dollar rose. It was no longer as good a deal for foreign countries to buy U.S. agricultural commodites. Exports dropped 30 million metric tons in the next five years. Production continued at record breaking levels. Surplus and carryover mounted up. Commodity prices fell. High oil prices led to increased manufacturing costs and, in turn, higher costs to the farmers for fertilizer, chemicals, and fuel. High expenses and low prices resulted in a depressed net farm income. The U.S. accumulated an ever increasing trade deficit. Interest rates rose. High interest rates and a low inflation rate added up to a high real interest rate. At a high real interest rate, buying land with borrowed money was no longer appealing. Land prices fell. Lower land values reduced farmers net worth and borrowing power. On paper, debt to asset rates rose to unacceptable (to lenders) levels.

Each year in the 1980's the situation worsened for the farm families. Those with large debt found that with their reduced incomes they could not even pay the interest on their notes. What were wise decisions to expand and produce in the 1970's turned into nightmares in the 1980's.

CRISIS SITUATION

Today the situation many farm families find themselves in is dismal. No longer do they have the net worth they once enjoyed. Projected cash flows for their operation are negative, or at best, close to break even.

Gratiot County Extension Agents estimate that 25 percent of their farm families have negative cash flow projections. 12 percent of the families have serious problems, and it is questionable whether they can endure another year. Some 15-18 percent of the families must make some major changes in their operations and in their lives.

Any change causes a certain amount of stress. The changes that these families will face are among the most stressful. Farm foreclosures lead the list.

The loss of a farm can create an emotional situation very much like the death of a close relative. The stress may be so hard to cope with that marriages and families break up because of it. Career changes will take place. Some, who have never worked anywhere but the farm, face major transitions in their lives. It's this emotional aspect of the current farm situation that too often is left unaddressed. Farm families are left to deal with it on their own.

COOPERATIVE EXTENSION'S CURRENT ROLE

The Cooperative Extension Service is playing an especially critical role in the current agricultural crisis. Agents provide assistance for both the financial and emotional problems farmers face. Farm families can have an individual or a team analysis of their operation. Individual agents in Michigan are currently spending long hours helping farm families develop positive cash flow projections for the coming year. Teams of agents are providing in-depth farm analysis for families.

The teams are called Extension Management Assistance Teams (EMAT). Fourteen teams are currently in operation in the state. Team members are county and regional extension agents. Each team can be tailored to fit the particular situation of the farm families. Agents are available with specialization in farm management, dairy, livestock, crops, and human development. Families who use EMAT teams will get a second view of their farms. They can get a complete financial check up and several possible changes or alternatives. The family can evaluate the options, chose the ones best for them, and take action to make the changes that will improve their situation. One team is made up of M.S.U. specialists and works closely with agricultural related business.

The team also provides the farm family assurance that others do care and they are not alone. Help to get through the situation emotionally is just as important as the financial help. Extension agents are providing additional programs to help the farm families cope with the situation. Networking with rural churches, mental health departments, and social services is taking place throughout the state.

Some farm family members will be forced to seek off farm employment. Several extension agents are offering workshops to give these displaced people the skills and directions they need to find employment. These programs are jointly sponsored with community education departments and community colleges. A state-wide effort is in progress to assist in training and placing these farm family members also.

The farm families are not the only ones affected by the farm situation. Small rural villages are feeling the pinch too. Equipment dealers and other agri-businesses are also economically troubled. An understanding of how the situation came about is needed by everyone. Nothing is achieved by blaming each other or oneself. Everyone must support and care for one another as rural communities work through their problems.

AGRICULTURE FUTURE

The future of agriculture is beginning to look a little brighter. The trends are turning. The major world factors that affect agriculture are changing direction.

For the last two months the value of the U.S. dollar had been dropping. This means exports could once again pick up. Inflation is predicated to increase. Assets will increase in value, and debt can be paid off with cheaper dollars. Measures are being taken to cut the deficit. Interest rates are slowly coming down.

Oil prices have fallen. Agricultural expenses should, in turn decrease. The new farm bill will keep the gross farm income fairly constant over the next 2-3 years by keeping production down. With a constant gross income and lower expenses, net farm income once again may begin to rise.

Profitability could slowly return to agriculture if these turnarounds continue. The return to profitability will be too slow for a number of farm families, and many will lose their farms. The farmers remaining will see an easy return to prosperity. The early 80's have taken its toll. The farmers that do remain must develop more sophisticated financial skills and must become wiser managers.

Changes and adjustments will have to be made. Over time, agriculture will continue to experience good and bad cycles. As sure as the human race will continue to need food to survive, there is a future in farming.

MATT SNYDER, NEBRASKA WINNER 1985-86 VFW VOICE OF DEMOCRACY SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM

HON. VIRGINIA SMITH

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues the winning entry in the Nebraska Voice of Democracy contest, sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars and its ladies auxiliary.

The author is Matthew Snyder of Broken Bow, NE, and I am extremely proud of his inspirational thoughts about the future of America. I hope my colleagues will find his essay of interest:

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

(By Matt Snyder)

We stand right at the mid-point of the decade. In only fifteen years we will be welcoming a new millennium—the year 2000. As we look toward that horizon—toward the twenty-first century—we realize that it is today's American youth who will determine our nation's course.

How will we do? It is appropriate and timely for use to begin now, preparing for the challenges America and our generation will face.

First, let me backtrack a little to consider how earlier generations of Americans prepared themselves for the coming of a new century. From our nation's very birth, Americans have accepted challenges which seemed to threaten our future. As we approached the nineteenth century, colonial farmers and merchants, trappers and bookkeepers, formed hometown militias and risked their lives in battle against those who would deny basic human rights in this new land.

Midway through that century, Americans again were called to take up arms to preserve the unity of our young country, and our nation came out of this internal struggle a freer and stronger country.

Barely into the twentieth century Americans were called to battle twice, joining free forces all over the world—forces determined that mankind would not be ruled by fascist tyrants. Once again we proved to ourselves and to others, that America was strong and more than willing to protect that invaluable freedom with the strength that is America.

I think it is appropriate, as we consider the new millennium on our horizon, that we remember the lessons yesterday—that they might guide us tomorrow. Consider, for a moment, one of those lessons as described by an American poet, Douglas Mallach, in the first stanza of this poem. He creates an imagery which seems very appropriate here.

The tree that never had to fight
For sun and sky and air and light;
That stood out in the open plain
And always got its share of rain,
Never became a forest king,
But lived and died a shrubby thing.

Facing challenges with optimism and courage has become an American tradition—a tradition we must carry with us into the twenty-first century. If we see a better life on the horizon, we must not be blind to the challenges which lie between us and that dream.

We know that if we are to conquer disease, we must begin our preparation today. If our horizon holds dreams of energy independence, it is today's graduates who will have to find new ways to tap new deposits of oil and coal below the earth's surface. If the very spirit of America is to serve us well into the new era, we must accept the challenge of instilling American values in the next generation.

America is rich in resources—resources beyond minerals and food, beyond medical advances and education. And we are at this moment at the brink of discovering and developing that which I am convinced is our greatest resource of all, our generosity and pride of nation.

It is a unique opportunity for America's youth to lead this exploration and development. And when today's youth reach those horizons which they explored and then developed, they can say.

America fought.
And America will be that forest king.

When we meet those horizons we have set, we must not stop. We must expand them. We must not only find ways to reach below the earth's surface, but we must put our energy resources to work to keep America the industrial giant of the world. We must not only prepare to conquer disease, but we must continue to improve the quality of life. We should not stop at instilling American values in the next generation, but must live so that each new generation has cause to be proud of their country. And after we have expanded and passed those horizons we set, we can say with pride in our voice,

American grew,
America is the forest king,
And America will never die a shrubby thing.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

HON. THOMAS J. TAUKE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, each year the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States and its ladies auxiliary conduct the Voice of Democracy scriptwriting contest. Winners from each State were chosen from more than 250,000 secondary school students who participated in the 1986 contest.

I am pleased to offer to my colleagues the winning script from the State of Iowa. John Hedgecoth, a junior from Cedar Rapids, won the recognition with a thoughful dessertation on the immense challenges facing U.S. youth stemming from rapid growth of knowledge and technology. John, son of Dale and Beverly Hedgecoth, attends College Community School in Cedar Rapids.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

(By John Hedgecoth)

As I awoke in the chilly Colorado air, the song of a bird informed me that the morning had begun without me. As I stepped outside, though, I noticed something missing. There were only red streaks across the sky, no other light.

Eventfully I figured out that because we were located in a valley, the sun had to rise above a mountain to reach us. In so many ways, this is an accurate representation of the situation of America's youth today. Because of the nation's social, political, and economic problems, our horizon lies beyond a peak that we must first attain before reaching it. We can rise above the valley that our nation has slipped into if we understand what's happening in the present and work to correct our problems in the future.

Arguably the most threatening development in the world community in recent years for the United States has been the drastic increase in the amount of knowledge and technology in the world. It will ultimately be the responsibility of my generation to deal with this high-tech revolution and this nation must take control of it if we are to remain a world power. With the advent of the computer age and the development of lasers, robots, and the like, knowledge is exploding, increasing at unbelievable rates.

For most American's, much of the new technology is out of reach, not understood. This new knowledge must be brought under control and grasped by America's youth if we are to move on up the mountain. Gaining control, though, is not the only objective in tackling the high-tech revolution. After grasping it, we must put it to practical use here in America.

During the industrial revolution, thousands of inventions were created in the United States, along with new production methods, and even new marketing strategies. Today, we see the same phenomena, ideas springing up all over the country. But unlike the industrial revolution, many of these ideas are not being kept in the United States. Up and coming nations such as Japan take technology developed here in the United States and harness it for practical use, then market it back here. It seems that everywhere you turn the newest high-tech ideas are foreign made. The best televisions, the most advanced cars, are made outside the United States. It is the responsibility of my generation in the coming years to harness new ideas and produce them here. For the first time the United States is a debtor nation in trade. We have the technology, and the leaders, businessmen, investors, executives, and workers of tomorrow must work to keep American technology harnessed and used at home.

Gaining control of and harnessing technology and knowledge, however, are both relatively easy concepts to visualize, but may be more difficult to implement.

With knowledge and technology comes man's natural drive to try and make life easier. Today the newest inventions make middle class life more plush than it has even been before. More computerized household items and a more automated workplace means life can become very easy for America but—with automation comes what appears to be less of a need for manpower, when in reality, manpower needs to be and must be present in order for our society to function. This is the largest portion of the challenge, the strongest part of the peak.

With more and more jobs becoming automated and those jobs that remain becoming more highly skilled, where is the place for the worker in future society? It is inconceivable that all workers could be employed in service occupations, so the challenge is to improve the quality, but at the same time hang on to the old patterns of American life.

If my generation can gain control of and harness this new influx of knowledge and technology, and at the same time keep a stable society, we will have come to the top of the peak, to find the sun shining bright on the new horizon.

POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT IN TAIWAN

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, I commend to the attention of my colleagues an address given before the Formosan Association for Public Affairs by a distinguished member of the other body, Senator HART of Colorado.

ADDRESS OF SENATOR GARY HART, FORMOSAN ASSOCIATION FOR PUBLIC AFFAIRS, FEBRUARY 27, 1986

It's a pleasure for me to be here today to address this gathering sponsored by the Formosan Association for Public Affairs. Since 1982, FAPA has established itself as a leading organization speaking out on behalf of human rights for the people of Taiwan. The activities of FAPA have been widely recognized within the Congress and among Americans who concern themselves with peace and justice in Asia and beyond.

This day has an historic significance for US-Asian relations; indeed, for relations between East and West as a whole. The signing of the Shanghai Communique fourteen years ago began a transformation of the foundations of the world order, marked by the opening of a relationship with the People's Republic. The so-called normalization of relations between the United States and the People's Republic was widely heralded, bringing forward the possibility of reduced international tensions and a new partnership in Asia.

For the people of Taiwan, however, this new era has been especially challenging, marked by the rupture of diplomatic relations with the United States and an increasingly difficult and hazardous international status.

But the United States has a long historic relationship with the people of Taiwan. Taiwan is clearly recognized as one of Asia's economic miracles, sustaining annual growth rates of ten percent or more in recent years. Taiwan has developed at an unprecedented pace from an agricultural to an industrial economy, an economy in which the United States has invested over $1 billion over the years. Visitors to Taiwan return with deep impressions of the cultural vibrancy, the high rate of literacy and the overall sophistication of Taiwanese society. It is a fact that Taiwan, in spite of the severe adversities it has faced in its recent history, enjoys some of the highest living and educational standards in Asia.

For most Americans, however, there is a cloud which hangs over our relations with the people of Taiwan. The issues are fundamentally political. The perception is widespread that Taiwan's political development has not kept pace with its economic progress. Despite the near universal economic enfranchisement of the Taiwanese population, the perception is strong in the United States that the people on Taiwan have not had access to adequate political participation. Thirty seven years of martial law, even during times of challenge to external security, cannot be sanctioned by Americans.

For many in Taiwan, the threat of external invasion is sufficient reason to restrict political activity and free expression. It is understandable, they argue, that a society which lives in a constant state of fear for its survival cannot possibly afford the luxury of domestic political liberties.

These political conditions are not accepted by an American public which equates modernity with freedom. As we have seen in many areas of the world—from Central America, to Haiti, to the Philippines—the American public does not countenance political repression. Some call this view naive. In my judgment, it is both a practical policy and a moral imperative.

Our nation believes from experience that democracy is not only the preferred path to moderization, but a prerequisite for stability and the long-term viability of governments.

The United States policy will continue to be conditioned by what we call "linkage"—the inherent relationship between U.S. involvement in a country and the pattern of its political behavior. If we have linkage in our relations with the Soviet Union—where arms control agreements are impeded by Soviet human rights violations, even when the Soviets have the power to annihilate us—one can be sure this will be the case with other states which hold fewer cards.

I believe Americans and the people of Taiwan share a common vision which enables them to increase their prosperity under genuine democratic rule. We differ not in goals, but in means. I and most Americans strongly support the efforts of those in Taiwan working through legal channels to increase political participation, respect for human rights and freedom of expression. I and most Americans are opposed to martial law—not just for its pernicious effect on individuals, but because of our conviction that this kind of repression ultimately leads to instability.

I applaud the progress that has been made recently in incorporating more native Taiwanese in the political process, including the growth in the number of native Taiwanese in the parliament. I would hope and encourage my Taiwanese friends to continue this progress, and to permit formally constituted opposition parties to participate in a pluralistic system. But it must be recognized that the threat to Taiwan's interests do not reside with its own people—unless they are denied basic human freedoms. Enfranchised, they will work for the common good, united behind the common goals of prosperity and security. Disenfranchised, they may try to express political grievances through insurgency or violence. This is the imperative of political modernization.

It is not for me to spell out the details of Taiwan's future. The United States has pledged under the Taiwan Relations Act to (quote) "make clear that the United States decision to establish diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China rests upon the expectation that the future of Taiwan will be determined by peaceful means." This is a fundamental commitment. And for now, all indications from the PRC are encouraging. Tensions in the Taiwan Strait are at an historic low. And the government of the PRC continues to pledge for its part that it has no intention of resorting to violence to resolve the disputes over Taiwan's destiny.

It has been my privilege to work with the leaders of FAPA for democracy and human rights on Taiwan since this young organization was formed four years ago. They've fought effectively for Congressional resolutions which focus attention on martial law, and made personal pleas on the behalf of individuals whose human rights have been violated. With your help, we've been able to make a difference in the lives of people whose anguish and repression would not otherwise be known.

ARTS APPROPRIATIONS

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, today, artists across this country are fighting for their lives. In spite of their best efforts to become financially sound, these efforts are being cruely and unnecessarily undermined. Federal funding of our Nation's cultural programs is the cornerstone of a complex and interdependent system of arts fundraising. In order to keep our Nation's cultural activity thriving, this Federal money must continue to be available.

This morning I testified at a hearing of the House Appropriations Committee, Subcommittee on the Interior, in support of funding for the National Endowment for the Arts, the National Endowment for the Humanities, the Institute of Museum Services, and the Historic Preservation Fund. I urge all of my colleagues to weigh the true value of the arts and humanities to our society and to treat those programs fairly when considering the Nation's budget for the coming year. The text of my statement follows:

Mr. Chairman. Thank you for this opportunity to present my views before the distinguished members of the subcommittee regarding President Reagan's fiscal year 1987 budget proposal for the National Endowments for the Arts and Humanities, the Institute of Museum Services, and the Historic Preservation Fund. As an Executive Board member of the Congressional Arts Caucus and representative of a district in which perhaps the greatest number of artists work and reside, I commend the Chairman and Subcommittee for your diligent work and consistent support of our nation's cultural programs.

It is unfortunate that we must meet this year under circumstances no better than those under which we have been meeting for the last five years. The President has again proposed a budget for the arts and humanities that is both inadequate and unjust.

Under the President's latest plan, which is nearly identical to that which we rejected last year, the budget of the National Endowment for the Arts would be reduced by 12.5 percent, from $165.6 million to $144.9 million. Humanities funding would suffer a 9.3 percent cut, from $139.4 million to $126.4 million. And the IMS would be cut by 98 percent, leaving just enough to close down shop.

Special attention must be paid to the plight of the Institute of Museum Services. This is the fourth time Mr. Reagan has proposed the elimination of this program, which provides the only outside operating support available to museums. To annually subject the museum community to a life or death fight for survival is both cruel and unnecessary.

The Congress, with your strong leadership, has steadfastly overcome past administration proposals to gut funding for the arts and humanities. This year, unfortunately, the prospects for similar victories have worsened. Something new has happened in Washington in the past year: adoption of the Gramm-Rudman budget balancing act.

Mr. Reagan claims that programs such as the arts must be sacrificed to ease the deficit crisis. True, our budget is out of balance, but clearly it is not the fault of spending for the arts or any other domestic program. It is the result of an inequitable tax policy and an unprecedented peace-time military buildup. With proposed outlays for cultural programs totaling five one-hundredths of one percent of the total federal budget, how much savings through cuts to these programs can Mr. Reagan possibly hope to achieve?

The government's support of cultural excellence has benefitted the general welfare of this nation far beyond the miniscule financial investment. For us in New York City, the arts are not only a source of pride and cultural enrichment, they are big business. The arts contribute over $5.6 billion to the economy of the region, generating over 117,000 jobs, enriching hotels, restaurants, real estate, utilities, transportation, medical and educational services and the finance and insurance businesses.

While the arts are an economic boon to us, they are not self-supporting. In spite of the efforts of cultural organizations to take on a larger part of the financial burden, their efforts are continually being undermined. The administration's persistent efforts to eliminate postal subsidies for nonprofit organizations have resulted in a 45 percent increase in mailing costs since January 1st, denying many arts organizations one of the most crucial instruments for fundraising. Spiraling real estate costs, especially in New York City, are squeezing artists out of necessary rehearsal and performance space. Insurance costs have become prohibitive, corporate mergers are eliminating corporate arts programs, and proposed changes in the tax code may limit charitable contributions. And with the prospect of Gramm-Rudman taking huge amounts of money from state and local governments, their funding programs will focus more acutely on the needs of the hungry, the homeless, and the unemployed.

It has been the President's intention all along to shift the burden of the arts to private rather than public funding. But the President must realize that even if the private sector could assume all the financial responsibility for the arts, it would not resolve all the problems created by federal cutbacks. Private donors usually avoid supporting unusual or controversial efforts. Corporations risk the least and gain the most by contributing to established cultural institutions and to projects that are likely to have widespread popular support. We risk choking off spontaneity and innovation, which are the lifeblood of artistic creativity, when we depend too heavily on private funding. Our artists on the vanguard of creative development would be hardest hit of all.

Federal support is an essential part of our nation's network of cultural support which includes all levels of government, corporations, foundations, and individuals. Arts organizations, large and small, will attest that when the federal funds come in, other funders show up. We cannot support the administration's attempt to destroy this interdependent system.

Mr. Chairman, your task this year is especially difficult. The pressures under which you are working are tremendous. But I urge the subcommittee to weigh the true value of the arts and treat these programs fairly. If we are going to continue our efforts to encourage and strengthen our nation's artistic and cultural life, then we absolutely must continue our support for these modestly priced federal programs. Funding for the arts is one of the best investments we can make for the future of this nation.

INTRODUCTION OF THE HAZARDOUS MATERIALS TRANSPORTATION SAFETY AMENDMENTS OF 1986

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, April 17, 1986

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Hazardous Materials Transportation Safety Amendments of 1986. This legislation is a comprehensive package of proposals which, I believe, will go a long way toward making some sense out of our hazardous materials transportation laws.

Over the past several months I have been pleased to work with many of our colleagues including Representative CARDISS COLLINS on this legislation. Last October, I formed an informal task force in my own State of Colorado comprised of a bipartisan group of State legislators, State and local officials, and community groups to help me draft this bill. We have received input on the legislation from all over the country—from as many as 30 States.

According to the Department of Transportation, in 1984 there were 37,800 accidents involving trucks which resulted in 2,700 fatalities, 2,800 injuries, and $390 million in property damage. As more and more hazardous material is being transported, the risks to all of us increase substantially. Yet, our Federal truck safety and hazardous materials transportation laws are so weak, confusing, and often conflicting that it is no wonder they are rarely enforced.

The Federal Truck Safety and Hazardous Materials Programs are adminstered through at least three different agencies in the Department of Transportation alone. They are rarely coordinated and extremely underfunded in proportion to their public health and safety missions. Because data collection is virtually nonexistent, Federal authorities don't even know who or what they are overseeing. This confusion hampers State enforcement efforts and makes our safety laws an accident waiting to happen.

Federal rules on routing, which require trucks carrying hazardous materials to go around populous areas, have rarely been enforced, and sometimes conflict with local rules. Regulations requiring that trucks carrying explosives are attended at all times by a driver or a qualified representative are unenforceable. Why? Because there are no Federal standards for these parking places, called safe havens. Most States, have not designated special places for the safe parking of hazardous materials. Drivers of trucks with dangerous materials sleep somewhere, but in which neighborhood?

Federal laws governing drivers of trucks carrying hazardous and nuclear materials are extremely weak. In most cases, a driver carrying bombs has no greater experience or qualifications than a driver carrying a load of vegetables. In fact, Federal regulations merely require that a driver of a truck carrying hazardous materials take a general, open-book test that contains only a couple of questions on hazardous materials. Incredibly, the driver only has to take the test, not pass it. Drivers carrying hazardous materials are not required to be familiar with any other aspects of driving—such as how to negotiate a Colorado mountain pass—which obviously could affect safety. This is an intolerable situation.

I was amazed to learn that 64 percent of hazardous materials incidents which occurred in the last 4 years were caused by human error. The National Transportation Safety Board has investigated numerous accidents that may have been prevented by better training of those who load, unload, and handle hazardous materials. Clearly, safety must start at the loading dock.

An Office of Technology Assessment [OTA] report released 2 weeks ago dramatically highlighted serious deficiencies in our emergency response capabilities. In its press statement, OTA concluded that 75 precent of local police and firefighters, often the first to respond to an accident, are unprepared to deal with a hazardous materials disaster. Surely, we can not afford to leave our public safety officials unprepared to deal with hazardous materials incidents.

Nuclear transportation is a critical issue that is becoming more serious with the passage of time. When permanent nuclear waste repositories are finally designated—most likely in the West—Colorado may be seriously affected. Yet, in designating these sites the Department of Energy has given short shift to the impact on the country of transporting nuclear materials.

So what can we do about these problems? As many State legislators know too well, the answers are neither easy nor clear cut. Protecting our citizens involves a partnership of Federal, State, and local governments. Shippers and carriers benefit from the safe transportation of hazardous materials because a good safety record is good business. Everyone must work together toward protecting the public.

The Hazardous Materials Transportation Safety Amendments legislation seeks to foster a constructive partnership between all interested parties. It strives to recognize Federal, State, and local responsibilities. It encourages national standards in some areas to end confusion, while at the same time, it urges States and localities to deal with transportation problems within their jurisdictions.

Let me summarize the major provisions of this legislation:

COORDINATION OF SAFETY PROGRAMS

First, this legislation moves the motor carrier safety functions from the Federal Highway Administration [FHWA], and hazardous materials transportation functions from the Research and Special Programs Administration [RSPA] to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration [NHTSA]. This is more than a shift of acronyms. These changes provide a focal point for truck safety and hazardous materials in the Department of Transportation by combining agencies that issue vehicle standards, enforce in-use regulations, inspect and audit carriers and shippers and set standards for routing, emergency response training, packaging, and placarding. We are creating a sort of one-stop-shopping for hazardous materials transportation which should be of tremendous help to States and localities and will help facilitate better congressional oversight.

INCREASED RESOURCES

Second, the legislation authorizes increased funding for motor carrier safety and for hazardous materials programs conducted by the Federal Government. Currently, there is only one Federal inspector for every 40,000 trucks. In my own State of Colorado, there are only two part-time inspectors and one trainee to audit the 2,600 motor carriers domiciled there. Clearly this is an impossible workload. Thus, this legislation requires the Bureau of Motor Carrier Safety to hire 150 new Federal safety inspectors and auditors over the next 2 years—more than double the current Federal force. I am pleased to see that the Department of Transportation has also recognized this severe problem and has proposed an increase in inspectors.

The legislation also authorizes increased funding for the Motor Carrier Safety Assistance Program [MCSAP], and extends the program through 1989. NCSAP provides grants to States to hire truck safety inspectors and funds other motor carrier safety efforts. This additional funding will come from the Highway Trust Fund which is projected to have a $9 billion balance at the beginning of fiscal year 1987. Thus, increased funding will not result in additional costs to the taxpayers.

ROUTES AND SAFE HAVENS

The legislation provides grants from MCSAP to States and localities to determine the safest routes for transportation to designated routes within and between their jurisdictions. This is a State and local function, as these entities are best able to develop safest route scenarios. What we are providing here are incentive grants to get States and localities talking with industry and neighboring States and jurisdictions to designate sensible routes that provide the greatest protection for citizens. DOT is charged with developing the technical guidelines to help aid this process and to settle disputes, should they arise between States.

DOT is also required to set minimum standards for safe havens for hazardous materials, including explosives and nuclear materials, and to give guidance to States in designating these protected parking spots. A directory of routes and safe havens must also be published so that motor carriers have a directory of where they may travel.

REGISTRATION

This bill requires DOT to annually register shippers, carriers, manufacturers, and others connected with hazardous materials transportation. This provision is extremely important because DOT does not now have accurate data on who or what it is regulating. How can we target enforcement if we do not know what is out there on the roads?

EMERGENCY RESPONSE

Emergency response is primarily a local issue, but, as OTA recently concluded, there is a pressing national need to train first responders—police and firefighters who are often the first on the scene of an accident. Many different training programs exist, but they are not reaching sufficient numbers of first responders. A particularly severe need for training exists in the smaller urban and rural areas of the country. These smaller localities are often those places least able to afford training for their personnel. Moreover, some training programs are simply inadequate.

This section of my legislation requires the Secretary of Transportation to make grants to States and localities to train personnel to make emergency responses. The bill authorities grants from the Highway Trust Fund at $5 million for fiscal year 1987, $10 million for fiscal year 1988, and $15 million for fiscal years 1989, 1990, and 1991 respectively. Any State or locality can apply for a grant to cover up to 75 percent of the cost of a training program. Additionally, DOT is required to establish guidelines for training programs used under the grant. Thus, we're helping to pay the cost of training personnel and ensuring that training is adequate.

DRIVER QUALIFICATIONS

While licensing drivers is, and should remain a function of each individual State, there is a tremendous Federal interest in ensuring that drivers of trucks carrying hazardous materials in interstate commerce have the necessary experience and qualifications to do so. We are only too aware in Colorado that truck drivers are unfamiliar with our mountainous terrain. The very frequent use of runaway truck ramps in our mountains highlights this point. The torpedo accident illustrated how easy it is for a person with little previous experience to drive legally a vehicle carrying explosives.

This legislation requires DOT to conduct a rulemaking to beef up qualifications for drivers of trucks carrying hazardous materials. DOT is required to consult with and take recommendations of States, motor vehicle administrators, carriers, shippers, insurers and drivers of hazardous materials in setting standards. In order to drive a truck carrying hazardous materials, the driver must have successfully completed a written examination, have experience in driving trucks with nonhazardous materials first, have experience in driving over different terrains—the mountains, for example—be familiar with motor carrier safety regulations and hazardous materials transportation regulations and have knowledge of emergency response equipment and procedures.

States would be required to implement these new procedures for licensing drivers of hazardous materials in 2 years' time. If a State has a better idea or additional requirements, we allow that flexibility. If some States do not adopt these new driver qualifications they would be subject to losing 15 percent of their MCSAP grant in each year in which the State does not comply with these standards. While I don't often advocate this type of penalty, the need for uniformity in licensing drivers who transport dangerous materials is clear: Unless all States have similar laws, there will be the tendency for drivers to get licensed in the State with the easiest qualifications. This would clearly undermine the benefits of the program.

This section also requires those who handle hazardous materials in the loading and unloading stages to know how to do so.

NUCLEAR TRANSPORTATION

This section requires the Secretary of Transportation to conduct an analysis of the risks to health, safety, and the environment associated with the transportation of high-level nuclear waste and spent fuel to the five potential geologic repository sites to be nominated under the Nuclear Waste Policy Act, and to and from any monitored retrievable storage site authorized under that Act.

This is an important section for many areas of the country. Although the Secretary of Energy is supposed to be considering transportation of nuclear wastes, this issue has not been addressed with sufficient vigor. For example, it is vitally important to us in Colorado—as we look at the prospect of nearly 6,000 shipments of nuclear waste through our State—that the transportation impact be considered. I believe that DOT, with its expertise in this area, can provide valuable input into this process.

TRUCK BRAKES

When my subcommittee held hearings on truck safety enforcement last summer in Denver, Colorado's Governor Lamm testified that 21 percent of the violations found in recent state truck inspections were brake violations. Obviously, proper maintenance of truck brakes is critical in a State with such mountainous terrain. Yet, I discovered that Federal rules allow front brakes on trucks to be disconnected. In fact, some operators believe that disconnecting truck brakes helps the driver to maneuver their vehicles better. This is absurd. Thus, this legislation abolishes the regulation allowing brakes disconnection and requires DOT to take steps to eduate drivers on the need for front brakes.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to invite our colleagues in the House to cosponsor this legislation and to join me in working to see that it is passed.

The bill follows:

H.R. 4612

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Hazardous Materials Transportation Safety Amendments of 1986".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) according to data of the Department of Transportation there were 37,800 accidents in 1984 involving regulated motor carriers, which resulted in 2,700 fatalities, 28,000 injuries, and $390,000,000 in property damage;

(2) the ratio of Federal safety inspectors to carriers has worsened substantially, as demonstrated by the fact that in 1975 there was 1 safety inspector for every 1,300 carriers, and in 1984 there was 1 for every 2,200 carriers or approximately 1 inspector for every 40,000 trucks;

(3) motor carrier safety functions of the Department of Transportation have not been carried out efficiently and effectively;

(4) the responsibility for hazardous materials transportation safety and enforcement in the Department of Transportation is not coordinated;

(5) there exists within the Federal Highway Administration the conflicting roles of promoting and regulating the highway transportation industry which have directly affected the ability of the United States Government to protect its citizens and ensure the safety of its system of interstate highway transportation;

(6) the Office of Technology Assessment has concluded that 75 percent of firefighters and police in the United States are inadequately prepared to respond to a hazardous materials transportation accident;

(7) the lack of designated routes for the motor carrier transportation of hazardous materials has hampered enforcement of Federal routing regulations and caused confusion among carriers and shippers;

(8) the Department of Transportation guidance to States and localities has lacked clear and concise methodology of the designation of routes for motor carriers transporting hazardous materials;

(9) since guidelines for the temporary storage of class A and B explosives and highway route controlled quantity radioactive materials are vague, few safe haven sites have been designated, and there is no official inventory of such sites, carriers are induced to improperly store such explosives and materials while they are in transit;

(10) the lack of an effective hazardous materials registration program for shippers and carriers has left the Department of Transportation with an incomplete inventory of those subject to its enforcement and has hampered effective targeting of enforcement;

(11) the Federal Government has not yet adequately assessed either the health, safety, or environmental risks of transporting high level radioactive waste and spent nuclear fuels or the transportation modes or routes that minimize such risks; and

(12) the training regulations of the Secretary of Transportation covering drivers and workers involved in the transportation of hazardous materials are vague and inadequate.

SEC. 3. COORDINATION OF RESPONSIBILITY.

(a) CENTRALIZATION AND COORDINATION.—Section 105(c) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (1), by redesignating paragraph (2) as paragraph (10), and by inserting after paragraph (1) the following:

"(2) duties and powers vested in the Secretary by chapters 5 and 31 (except those related to rail carriers);

"(3) duties and powers vested in the Secretary by sections 206, 210, and 212 of the Motor Carrier Safety Act of 1984 (49 U.S.C. App. 2505, 2509, and 2511);

"(4) duties and powers vested in the Secretary under the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act (49 U.S.C. App. 1801 and following) to inspect and examine records and properties of persons and enforce regulations with respect to motor vehicles and the transportation or shipment of hazardous materials by motor vehicle;

"(5) duties and powers vested in the Secretary under section 18 of the Noise Control Act of 1972 (42 U.S.C. 4917);

"(6) duties and powers vested in the Secretary under section 30 of the Motor Carrier Act of 1980 (49 U.S.C. 10927 note);

"(7) duties and powers vested in the Secretary under section 18 of the Bus Regulatory Reform Act of 1982 (49 U.S.C. 10927 note);

"(8) duties and powers vested in the Secretary under sections 401 through 404, and section 414, of the Surface Transportation Act of 1982 (49 U.S.C. 2301-2304 and 2314);

"(9) duties and powers vested in the Secretary under the Act of February 23, 1905 (49 U.S.C. App. 1201 and following); and".

(b) BUREAU OF MOTOR CARRIER SAFETY.—Section 105 of title 49, United States Code, is amended by inserting after subsection (e) the following:

"(f)(1) There is established in the Administration a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Motor Carrier Safety (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as the 'Bureau').

"(2) The Bureau shall be headed by an Associate Deputy Administrator for Motor Carrier Safety who shall be appointed by the Secretary.

"(3) The Associate Deputy Administrator shall have direct control over employees of the Bureau, and the employees of the Bureau shall report directly to the Associate Deputy Administrator.

"(4) The Administrator shall carry out the following duties and powers through the Associate Deputy Administrator for Motor Carrier Safety:

"(A) Duties and powers vested in or assigned to the Administrator to the extent they pertain to (i) investigations and enforcement operations regarding motor carrier safety conducted by offices and other units which are not located at the site of the principal office of the Administration and (ii) coordination of such operations and those conducted by State and local law enforcement offices.

"(B) Duties and powers under sections 401 through 404, and section 414, of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 (49 U.S.C. 2301-2304).

"(C) Such additional duties and powers as may be prescribed by the Administrator.

"(5) Subject to the approval of the administrator, the Associate Deputy Administrator may issue rules and regulations to carry out powers and duties under this subsection.

"(6) The head of the other organizational units within the Administration shall consult with the Associate Deputy Administrator regarding any matters within their organizational units regarding motor carrier safety.

"(7) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the position held by a motor carrier safety inspector employed by the Administration shall be classified in accordance with chapter 51 of title 5, but at not lower than the grade of the General Schedule at which it was classified on January 1, 1982.".

(c) OFFICE OF HAZARDOUS MATERIALS TRANSPORTATION.—Section 105 of title 49, United States Code (as amended by subsection (b)), is amended by inserting after subsection (f) the following:

"(g)(1) There is established in the Administration an office to be known as the Office of Hazardous Materials Transportation (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as the 'Office').

"(2) The Office shall be headed by an Associate Administrator for Hazardous Materials Transportation who shall be appointed by the Secretary from persons who are technically qualified in hazardous materials transportation.

"(3) The Associate Administrator shall have direct control over employees of the Office, and the employees of the Office shall report directly to the Associate Administrator.

"(4) The Administrator shall carry out the following duties and powers through the Associate Administrator for Hazardous Materials Transportation:

"(A) The duties and powers of the Secretary of Transportation under the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act other than the duties and powers delegated to the Coast Guard (49 C.F.R.§ 1.46(t)), to the Federal Aviation Administration (49 C.F.R.§ 1.47(j)), to the Federal Highway Administration (49 C.F.R.§ 1.48(u)), and to the Federal Railroad Administration (49 C.F.R.§ 1.49(s)).

"(B) The duties and powers of the Secretary of Transportation under section 306(a) of the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act.

"(C) The duties and powers of the Secretary of Transportation under section 137 of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982.

(d) MOTOR CARRIER SAFETY RATINGS.—Section 105 of title 49, United States Code (as amended by subsection (c)), is amended by inserting after subsection (g) the following:

"(h) The Associate Deputy Administrator for Motor Carrier Safety shall notify each motor carrier of the safety rating established for the carrier under subsection (f)(4)(A). The carrier shall be notified of such rating upon completion of the investigation or audit conducted to establish such rating. Effective one year after the date of the enactment of this subsection, the Associate Deputy Administrator shall publish annually such safety ratings. The Government Printing Office shall make the publication of such rating available to the public at reasonable cost.".

SEC. 4. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

(a) MOTOR CARRIER SAFETY.—There is authorized to be appropriated to the Administrator of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration not to exceed $19,600,000 for fiscal year 1987 and $21,000,000 for fiscal year 1988 to carry out functions relating to motor carrier safety. The Administrator of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration shall obligate funds appropriated under this subsection to increase by 150 the number of motor carrier safety inspectors employed by the Administration.

(b) SURFACE TRANSPORTATION ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1982.—Section 404 of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 (49 App. U.S.C. 2304) is amended—

(1) by striking "$40,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$50,000,000";

(2) by striking "and" after "1987";

(3) by striking "$50,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$60,000,000"; and

(4) by striking "1988." and inserting in lieu thereof "1988; not to exceed $70,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1989; and not to exceed $80,000,000 in the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990.".

(c) HAZARDOUS MATERIALS TRANSPORTATION ACT.—Section 115 of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act is amended by striking out "and" after "1985," and by inserting before the period a comma and the following: "$6,750,000 for fiscal year 1987, and $7,000,000 for fiscal year 1988".

SEC. 5. TRANSPORTATION ROUTES AND PARKING SITES.

(a) GRANT PROGRAM.—Title IV of the Surface Transportation Act of 1982 is amended by adding at the end the following:

"GRANTS FOR TRANSPORTATION ROUTES AND PARKING SITES

"SEC. 407. (a) The Secretary shall make grants to States and political subdivisions for—

"(1)(A) the designation of routes within and between the States for the safe transportation of hazardous materials,

"(B) determining the relative safety of each of the routes proposed to be designated, and

"(C) enforcement of the use of the designated routes by motor carriers transporting hazardous materials, and

"(2) the designation of sites for the parking of motor vehicles transporting hazardous materials in accordance with regulations established by the Secretary for the designation of such sites.

A State which receives a grant under this subsection shall carry out the designations described in paragraphs (1) and (2) after consultations with the political subdivisions within the State, motor carriers which transport hazardous materials through the State, and adjacent States. Designations by States and political subdivisions shall be completed within 2 years of receiving a grant under this subsection.

"(b) The Secretary shall establish guidelines to assist States and political subdivisions of States in the designation of—

"(1) routes for the safe transportation within and between their jurisdictions of hazardous materials, and

"(2) site for the parking of motor vehicles transporting hazardous materials.

Guidelines under paragraph (2) shall include minimum safety criteria to be taken into account in the designation of parking sites.

"(c) The Secretary shall publish routes and parking sites which are designated by States and political subdivisions under grants under subsection (a) and ensure that such publication is available to motor carriers engaged in the transportation of hazardous materials.

"(d) For purposes of this section, the term 'hazardous materials' means hazardous materials designated under section 104 of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act.".

(b) PUBLICATION OF GUIDELINES.—The Secretary of Transportation shall publish guidelines under sections 407(a)(2) and 407(b) of the Surface Transportation Act of 1982 (as added by subsection (a)) within 180 days of the date of the enactment of this Act.

(c) AUTHORIZATION.—The first sentence of section 404 of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 is amended by striking out "section 402" and inserting in lieu thereof "sections 402 and 407".

SEC. 6. RECORD RETENTION FOR ENFORCEMENT OF ROUTES.

Section 106 of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(d) RECORD RETENTION.—Each person who is registered under subsection (b) shall maintain a description of the routes followed by such person in the transportation of class A or B explosives (as defined by the Secretary), hazardous materials designated under section 104, and highway route control radioactive materials. Each person required to maintain a description shall maintain it at the person's principal place of business for at least 6 months after the completion of the transportation to which the description relates.".

SEC. 7. ANNUAL MANDATORY REGISTRATION.

(a) ANNUAL REGISTRATION.—Section 106(b) of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "may be required by the Secretary to prepare" and inserting in lieu thereof "shall be required by the Secretary to annually prepare", and

(2) by striking out "not more often than once every 2 years".

(b) REGISTRATION FEE.—Section 106(b) of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act is amended by adding at the end the following: "The Secretary may establish a fee for the annual registration required by this subsection to cover the cost of such registration.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The Secretary of Transportation shall establish a timetable (not to exceed 3 years from the date of the enactment of this Act) for the registration of persons under section 106(b) of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act. The timetable shall establish a priority for the registration of persons under such section.

SEC. 8. EMERGENCY RESPONSE.

(a) TRAINING GRANTS.—Section 116 of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act is amended to read as follows:

GRANTS FOR EMERGENCY RESPONSE TRAINING

"SEC. 116. (a) GRANTS.—The Secretary shall make grants in fiscal years 1987 through 1991 to States and political subdivisions to assist in the training of personnel to make such responses. No grant may be made for more than 75 percent of the cost of any training program.

"(b) APPLICATIONS.—No grant may be made under subsection (a) unless an application therefor is submitted to and approved by the Secretary.

"(c) GUIDELINES.—the Secretary shall, in consulation with the Federal Emergency Management Agency, establish guidelines for training programs used under a grant under subsection (a).

"(d) THE AUTHORIZATION.—To make grants under subsection (a) there are authorized to be appropriated out of the Highway Trust Fund $5,000,000 for fiscal year 1987, $10,000,000 for fiscal year 1988, $15,000,000 for fiscal year 1989, $15,000,000 for fiscal year 1990, and $15,000,000 for fiscal year 1991.".

(b) PUBLICATION OF GUIDELINES.—The Secretary of Transportation shall publish guidelines under section 116(c) of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act (as added by subsection (a)) within 180 days of the date of the enactment of this Act.

(c) EMERGENCY RESPONSE INFORMATION REGULATIONS.—Within one year of the date of enactment of this Act the Secretary of Transportation shall by rule require—

(1) the listing of relevant emergency response telephone numbers on all shipping papers required by the Secretary in connection with the transportation of hazardous materials,

(2) that motor carriers transporting hazardous materials carry the most current publication of the Secretary prescribing emergency response procedures, and

(3) that such publication be located at facilities involved in the transportation of hazardous materials.

SEC. 9. LICENSING AND TRAINING OF DRIVERS.

(a) QUALIFICATIONS AND GUIDELINES.—Section 106 of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act, as amended by section 6, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(e) QUALIFICATIONS FOR LICENSING.—(1) The Secretary shall by rule establish minimum qualifications for the licensing by the States of drivers of motor vehicles transporting hazardous materials designated under section 104. In establishing such qualifications the Secretary shall consult with and take into account the recommendations of States, administrators of State motor vehicle administrations, carriers and shippers of such materials, insurers, and representatives of drivers.

"(2) Qualifications established under paragraph (1) shall require—

"(A) that a driver be licensed by only one State to transport hazardous materials,

"(B) successful completion of written examinations to test the qualifications of license applicants to drive motor vehicles used for the transportation of such materials and to retest applicants to determine the retention of such qualifications,

"(C) experience in transporting non hazardous materials,

"(D) experience in driving over different terrains,

"(E) experience in the handling of hazardous materials,

"(F) knowledge of the operation of emergency equipment used in responses to emergencies arising out of the transportation of such materials,

"(G) knowledge of the response procedures followed in such emergencies,

"(H) familiarity with Federal motor carrier safety regulations and Federal safety regulations respecting the transportation of such materials, and

"(I) a safe driving record.

"(f) TRAINING PROGRAM GUIDELINES.—The Secretary shall establish guidelines for training and retraining programs for drivers of motor vehicles transporting hazardous materials designated under section 104 and for other personnel, including loaders and handlers of such explosives and materials. The guidelines shall include provisions that require knowledge of—

"(1) the handling of such materials,

"(2) the operation of emergency equipment used in responses to emergencies arising out of the transportation of such materials,

"(3) the appropriate response procedures followed in such emergencies, and

"(4) familiarity with Federal motor carrier safety regulations and Federal safety regulations respecting the transportation of such materials.

"(g) REQUIREMENT.—Effective two years after the date of the enactment of this subsection, no person required under subsection (e) to be licensed by a State to transport hazardous materials may transport hazardous materials designated under section 104 or cause to be transported or shipped such materials unless such person has in effect a valid license issued under qualifications established under such subsection.".

(b) PUBLICATION OF QUALIFICATIONS AND GUIDELINES.—The Secretary of Transportation shall publish qualifications and guidelines under subsections (e) and (f) of section 106 of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act (as added by subsection (a)) within 180 days of the date of the enactment of this Act.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—(1) The requirement of section 106(e) of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act (as added by subsection (a)) respecting the licensing of drivers of motor vehicles transporting hazardous materials designated under section 104 of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act shall apply in a State upon the expiration of 2 years after the date of the enactment of this subsection unless the State has in effect alternate licensing requirements approved by the Secretary. The Secretary may promulgate regulations establishing procedures for the consideration and approval of such alternate requirements.

(2) The Secretary shall approve alternate licensing requirements submitted by a State unless the Secretary determines that such requirements are not consistent with the purpose of the licensing requirements of section 106(e) of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act.

(3) In any fiscal year in which a State is not in compliance with paragraph (1), the amount available to the State under appropriations made under section 404 of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 shall be reduced by 15 percent.

SEC. 10. HAZARDOUS MATERIALS FLOW STUDY.

(a) CONTINUING STUDY.—The Secretary of Transportation shall conduct a continuing study of the flow of hazardous materials in the United States which under regulations of the Secretary are required to bear at least two placards (49 C.F.R. Part 172, Subpart F). Such study shall be conducted—

(1) to improve the targeting of Federal enforcement of Department of Transportation requirements respecting the transportation of hazardous materials,

(2) to improve the enforcement by States and localities of their requirements respecting such transportation, and

(3) to assist in the development of emergency response capabilities by States and localities.

The study shall identify the routes followed in the shipment of such materials and the types of accidents and incidents involving the shipment of such materials which have required Federal, State, or local emergency response services. The Secretary shall make a report to the Congress on the results of the study within one year of the date of the enactment of this Act and therafter shall periodically report to the Congress any changes in the flow of hazardous materials identified by the study.

(b) HAZARDOUS MATERIALS DEFINED.—For purposes of subsection (a), the term "hazardous materials" means a hazardous material designated under section 104 of the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act.

SEC. 11. SHIPMENT OF NUCLEAR MATERIALS.

(a) ANALYSIS.—The Secretary of Transportation, in consultation with the Department of Energy, shall complete an analysis of the risks to health, safety, and the environment associated with transportation of high-level nuclear waste and spent nuclear fuel to (1) the five potential geologic repository sites to be nominated by the Secretary of Energy as suitable for site characterization pursuant to section 112(b) of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act, and (2) to and from any monitored retrievable storage site authorized pursuant to section 141 ot the Nuclear Waste Policy Act. In addition, the Secretary of Transportation shall evaluate and compare routes and transportation modes that entail the least risk to human health, safety, and the environment. In completing such analysis, the Secretary shall provide appropriate opportunity for public comment.

(b) REPORT.—The Secretary shall complete the analysis within one year of the date of the enactment of this Act and shall report the results of the analysis to the Congress and the Secretary of Energy.

SEC. 12. TRUCK BRAKES.

The regulations of the Administrator of the Federal Highway Administration published as section 393.42 of title 49 of the Code of Federal Regulations shall, effective 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, be of no force or effect and the Administrator may not issue an regulation having the same effect as such regulation. The Secretary of Transportation shall conduct such public information program as may be necessary to publicize the safety benefits of this section.

SEC. 13. TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.

(a) Section 104(c) of title 49, United States Code, is amended by inserting "and" at the end of paragraph (1), by striking out paragraph (2), and by redesignating paragraph (3) as paragraph (2).

(b) Section 104 of such title is amended by striking out subsection (d).

(c) Section 105(c) of title 49, United States Code, as amended by section 3, is further amended by adding after and below paragraph (10) the following:

"A decision of the Administrator in carrying out a duty or power specified in paragraphs (1) through (10) and involving notice and hearing required by law is administratively final.".

(d) Section 5316 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Associate Deputy Administrator for Motor Carrier Safety, National Highway Traffic Safety Administration.

"Associate Administrator for Hazardous Materials Transportation.".

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Friday, April 18, 1986

The House met at 11 a.m. and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. WRIGHT].

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, DC,
April 17, 1986.

I hereby designate the Honorable JIM WRIGHT to act as Speaker pro tempore on Friday, April 18, 1986.

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our thoughts and prayers, gracious God, are with the victims of the strife of our world. May Your comfort be with those who are captives and know not the freedoms that we enjoy. May Your spirit be with the families whose anxiety is overwhelming. May the hope and peace that we know in Your Word give comfort, strength, and assurance to all those whose joy is turned to mourning. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate has passed without amendment joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

H.J. Res. 582. Joint resolution to designate April 20, 1986, as "Education Day U.S.A."; and

H.J. Res. 599. Joint resolution commemorating the 25th anniversary of the Bay of Pigs invasion to liberate Cuba from Communist tyranny.

The message also announced that Mr. BURDICK be a conferee, on the part of the Senate, on the bill (H.R. 6), "An act to provide for the conservation and development of water and related resources and the improvement and rehabilitation of the Nation's water resources infrastructure," vice Mr. BAUCUS, excused.

SAN JOSE MERCURY-NEWS HONORED WITH PULITZER

(Mr. EDWARDS of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to learn that the Pulitzer Prize for international reporting has been awarded to the San José Mercury-News. It was the paper's outstanding series on the hidden wealth of ex-Philippine President Marcos that garnered the award for the paper. The work of series authors Pete Carey, Katherine Ellison, and Lewis M. Simons in investigating and documenting Marcos' vast financial interests around the world played a key role in the ousting of Marcos by the Philippine people.

As one of the representatives here in Congress of the city of San José, I must say it is nice to see the Pulitzer judges recognize what those of us from the city of San José have long known—that the Mercury-News is one of our Nation's finest papers. Its reporting and editorial writing are consistently of the highest caliber.

I know my colleagues join me in offering hearty congratulations to reporters Carey, Ellison, and Simons, Mercury News Executive Editor Robert Ingle, and all of the talented people at the San José Mercury-News.

ALLIES' RESPONSE TO UNITED STATES ANTITERRORISM IS THOUGHT-PROVOKING

(Mr. COUGHLIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my admiration and heartfelt thanks to the people and Governments of Great Britain, Israel, and Canada for their support of United States actions to combat terrorism by the Government of Libya. It is heartwarming to have friends of courage when difficult decisions must be made and sparks fly.

I am equally appalled by the actions of other so-called allies, particularly France, who caused our pilots an unduly grueling and difficult mission. I am sending a copy of these remarks to the President of France.

Does France make dark deals to ignore the presence of terrorists on her territory in exchange for protection from terrorist attack? Does she hide behind the defensive shield that American taxpayers and servicemen help provide and at the same time look the other way when American citizens are the targets of terrorist attack?

President Reagan approved a measured, calculated response to dastardly, irrefutable Libyan terrorist actions directed against Americans, but threatening the free world as well. There were extensive warnings to Mr. Qadhafi. Our allies, the Soviets, and the Congress were all notified of the President's view—a correct one—that terrorism must carry with it a heavy price.

Indeed, it is fair to say that our military action might not have been necessary at all if our allies had been more forthcoming in supporting economic sanctions against Libya, which we have long and actively sought to impose.

France had quite a different view when, on November 17, 1983, their Navy jets struck terrorist sites in Lebanon's Bekaa Valley following the bombing of French peacekeeping forces in Lebanon.

We are now being treated to pictures of bandaged children in Libya. The jury is still out on whether those casualties were the result of America's actions, or whether they were brought about by Libyan antiaircraft missiles that missed their mark and plummeted to earth. What is clear, however, is that specific instructions were given to our pilots to avoid damaging collateral targets or injuring civilians, and I am certain every effort was made to avoid doing so.

There appears to be more graphic attention to damage in Libya than there was to the fate of four Americans, including a baby, sucked out of a TWA jet at 15,000 feet 2 weeks ago following the explosion of a randomly placed bomb.

And where are the photos of the dead and hundreds of bandaged Americans and other injured when Libya's bomb devastated a West Berlin nightclub? These were deliberate acts intended to maim and kill Americans.

The facts may be that only the United States and a select few friends have the courage to stand up to terrorist kingpins like Mu'ammar Qadhafi. Given the experiences of so many of our friends, especially France, this is truly sad, if true. But not standing up against the reprehensible terrorist regimes that we condemn, some friends may be, in a sense, abetting them.

I urge those of our allies who have hesitated or failed to support America's response to Libyan terror to reconsider both America's reasons for conducting this raid and their own need to join in a united effort to defeat world terrorism. I urge them, too, to remember the major commitment America makes to world security through the United Nations and to their security every day through our participation in NATO, especially in light of the needs of our citizens here at home.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. SCHUETTE) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material:)

Mr. SLAUGHTER, for 45 minutes, on April 22, 1986.

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. EDWARDS of California) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material:)

Mr. ANNUNZIO, for 5 minutes, today.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to revise and extend remarks was granted to:

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. SCHUETTE) and to include extraneous matter:)

Mr. MCCOLLUM.

Mr. KEMP.

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. EDWARDS of California) and to include extraneous matter:)

Mr. AUCOIN.

Mr. LANTOS in two instances.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 6 minutes a.m.) under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, April 21, 1986, at 12 o'clock noon.

CONTRACTUAL ACTIONS, CALENDAR YEAR 1985, TO FACILITATE NATIONAL DEFENSE

The Clerk of the House of Representatives submits the following report for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD pursuant to section 4(b) of Public Law 85-804:

GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, DC, April 8, 1986.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: In accordance with the requirements of Public Law 85-804 as amended by Public Law 93-155 (50 U.S.C. 1431-1435) and Executive Order 10789, the General Services Administration reports that it did not receive any requests for relief under the extraordinary emergency authority provided by 50 U.S.C. 1431-1435 during calendar year 1985.

Sincerely,

TERENCE C. GOLDEN,
Administrator.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

3336. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Acquisition and Logistics, transmitting a report on DOD's efforts to increase defense contract awards to Indian-owned businesses during fiscal years 1984 and 1985, pursuant to Public Law 99-145, section 956(a) (99 Stat. 702); to the Committee on Armed Services.

3337. A letter from the Deputy Secretary, Department of Defense, transmitting a report of the salaries paid from Federal funds to officers and employees of Federal contract research centers which exceeded that for Level II of the Executive schedule, pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 2359; to the Committee on Armed Services.

3338. A letter from the Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs, transmitting a report of political contributions for Warren Zimmermann, of Virginia, a nominee for the rank of Ambassador in his capacity as Chief of the United States Delegation to the Vienna Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe Follow-up Meeting, pursuant to 22 U.S.C. 3944(b)(2); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

3339. A letter from the Administrator, General Services Administration, transmitting notification that the agency did not receive any requests for relief under the extraordinary emergency authority provided by 50 U.S.C. 1431-1435 during calendar year 1985, pursuant to 50 U.S.C. 1434; to the Committee on Government Operations.

3340. A letter from the Executive Director, Committee for Purchase From the Blind and Other Severely Handicapped, transmitting a report on the Committee's operations during fiscal year 1985, pursuant to the act of June 25, 1938, chapter 697, section 1(i) (85 Stat. 77); to the Committee on Government Operations.

3341. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the 1985 annual report of the National Park Foundation, pursuant to Public Law 90-209, section 10; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

3342. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to repeal section 10 of the Fishermen's Protective Act of 1967, as amended and for other purposes; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

3343. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of the Army (Civil Works), transmitting a report dated March 1, 1986, from the Chief of Engineers, Department of the Army, on Black Warrior and Tombigbee Rivers, Alabama, together with other pertinent reports (H. Doc. No. 99-205); to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation and ordered to be printed.

3344. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of the Army (Civil Works), transmitting a report dated August 16, 1984, from the Chief of Engineers, Department of the Army, on Duluth-Superior Harbor, Minnesota and Wisconsin, together with other pertinent reports. These reports are in final response to a resolution adopted December 11, 1969, by the Committee on Public Works of the United States House of Representatives (H. Doc. No. 99-204); to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation and ordered to be printed.

3345. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Labor, transmitting comments of the advisory committee to the Department of Short-Time Compensation with respect to the Department's recently submitted report entitled, "An Evaluation of Short-Time Compensation Programs" (Executive Communications Nos. 2539 and 2540), pursuant to Public Law 97-248, section 194(g)(2); to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3346. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Acquisition and Logistics, transmitting a report on DoD's experience with conversion to contractor operation of commercial functions previously performed by DoD personnel, pursuant to the 1986 Department of Defense Appropriations Act; jointly to the Committees on Armed Services and Appropriations.

3347. A letter from the Director, Office of Civilian Radioactive Waste Management, Department of Energy, transmitting the fourth annual report evaluating whether the revenues collected from waste disposal fees established under the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 are sufficient to offset program costs, pursuant to Public Law 97-425, section 302(a) (4); jointly to the Committees on Energy and Commerce and Interior and Insular Affairs.

3348. A letter from the Administrator, Agency for International Development, transmitting the Agency's annual report on its activities and progress to foster and implement the representation of minority group members and women in the Foreign Service, pursuant to 22 U.S.C. 3905(d); jointly to the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Post Office and Civil Service.

3349. A letter from the Assistant Attorney General, Department of Justice, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize appropriations for the purpose of carrying out the activities of the Department of Justice for fiscal year 1987 and for other purposes; jointly to the Committees on the Judiciary and Energy and Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. HAWKINS: Committee on Education and Labor. H.R. 2110. A bill to make technical corrections related to the Retirement Equity Act of 1984; with an amendment (Rept. 99-526, Pt. II). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

SENATE—Friday, April 18, 1986

(Legislative day of Tuesday, April 8, 1986)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable TED STEVENS, a Senator from the State of Alaska.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Our loving Father in Heaven, we feel a strange ambivalence this morning. We are experiencing elation and joy with this beautiful day. We are unspeakably grateful for life and breath and all the gracious gifts You so lavishly bestow upon us. But our hearts are heavy in the tragic loss of Sally Heet. We pray for Senator EVANS and those on his staff who have been traumatized by this tragedy. It troubles us, Father in Heaven, to think that such evil can lurk in the shadow of this center of great political power and justice. Comfort all of Sally's loved ones who mourn her loss and remove from the hearts of her peers any apprehension they may feel. We pray in His name Whose love transcends all things. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, April 18, 1986.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable TED STEVENS, a Senator from the State of Alaska, to perform the duties of the Chair.

STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. STEVENS, thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the distinguished majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each, followed by special orders in favor of Senators HAWKINS, PROXMIRE, and CRANSTON for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the special order in favor of Senator DURENBERGER be vitiated.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. There will be routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 12 noon with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

Following morning business, the Senate may be asked to turn to any of the following items: S. 49, the gun control bill. But in this case, about three of the principals are not available today. It is going to be difficult to do that. The motion to proceed to S. 1848, the drug export bill, is a possibility; and the executive nomination of Donald M. Newman. It is my understanding that we can do that perhaps on Monday without a rollcall vote. So that may be disposed of. Also S. 2180, the fire prevention bill, to which a daylight saving time amendment will be offered. However, that is not likely a good candidate today because some of the principals are not available.

I will say that Senate Concurrent Resolution 120, the budget resolution, will not be laid down today.

No votes will occur during today's session or on Monday's session.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the minority leader is recognized.

THE BUDGET RESOLUTION

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if I can inquire of the distinguished majority leader, yesterday, as he will recall, we again discussed the possibility of laying down the budget resolution. I believe he indicated that he was going to have a meeting about the matter.

Is there anything that he can now state as to what the prospects are for getting started on the budget debate the first of next week?

Mr. DOLE. It also had been my hope after that meeting to meet with the Speaker, and the Republican House leader, Congressman MICHEL. We requested to meet with the Speaker in a letter.

We have postponed that meeting until Monday or Tuesday.

I think after that meeting we may be able to move forward. I do not anticipate any further—I do not want to use the word "delay" because I hope I am not delayed. We will however certainly continue to meet after the budget is brought up.

One thing I hope we might be able to do is reduce that 50-hour period by some mutual agreement once we start on the budget. But I think until we have been on it a while, I will not make that request.

But to respond to the distinguished minority leader I think we have had meetings with about everyone who might be involved, and as soon as we can touch base with the Speaker—and maybe even before that—I am trying to have that meeting now on Monday. Hopefully we can start on that Monday.

I cannot make an absolute commitment. But I think that would be the case.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may reserve the balance of my time for later in the day.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent also that any statement I may wish to have appear at this point in the RECORD so appear.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

THE ZOOMING, BOOMING COST OF STAR WARS MAINTENANCE AND MODERNIZATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, star wars may cost $1 trillion or more for research, development, production and deployment. Will that be it? Once the star wars antimissile defense is in place, will that be the end of the immense burden? No, sir. And no way. Why? Why will not the major cost be behind us once we get this impenetrable defense in the sky in place? The surging trillion-dollar cost will go on and on because the star wars deployment will be just the starter. The deployed system will require constant, immensely expensive maintenance. Every day of every year in perpetuity we will have to lift huge payloads into space, manned with highly skilled experts to keep our legions of satellites and battle stations in reliable working order. Why can we not simply lift this complex hardware into space and forget it, until and unless someone mounts a nuclear attack? Here is why: the deployed system will have to be constantly renewed, refurbished, repaired. And how do we renew, refurbish and repair a galaxy of complex hardware deployed hundreds of miles above the Earth's surface and orbiting out in space? We have to lift in a long journey through space the new parts and new equipment to replace any defective, worn out, or otherwise malfunctioning equipment. We also will have to lift our maintenance experts into the far reaches of space. We have to provide them with the support facilities to keep them alive and functioning for weeks or months. We will have to do much more than that. We will have to lift repair shops, repair garages, in some cases actual factories into space. How much will that cost? Well, just sit down with a pencil and a sheet of paper and figure out the cost at a couple of thousands of dollars per pound to lift something like Andrews Air Force Base or a Boeing factory or a garage big enough to repair a battle station into space. Keep in mind, star wars will require hundreds of battle stations. Keeping these battle stations in top shape will be like maintaining an aircraft carrier at sea, but infinitely more difficult. The oceans are a relatively relaxed, easy, familiar environment. Moving vast cargoes into space shoots up the cost geometrically. The star wars battle stations will require a support fleet much like an aircraft carrier. The support fleet will require its own steady, unremitting stream of maintenance personnel and facilities. What will be the cost of maintaining the whole star wars array of hundreds of battle stations, thousands of satellites and an infinity of other complicated paraphernalia? Certainly hundreds of billions of dollars, perhaps trillions. And I am talking about the annual cost, year after year, every year. Will that cost of maintenance diminish? No. The technology of star wars missile defense is sure to race ahead. With it the complexity will surely increase and the cost of maintenance of the delicate, complex defense weapons will zoom ever upward.

Will maintenance be the biggest annual, continuing cost? No. Not by a long shot. For the biggest continuing cost consider modernization. Let us face it. The Soviet Union is not going to take a challenge to their superpower status without fighting back with an all-out effort to overwhelm it.

Certainly they will multiply the offensive nuclear missiles available to challenge star wars. They will refine and improve decoys designed to fool star wars. They will develop penetrators using much of the same technology star wars uses: x-ray lasers, chemical lasers, and a variety of as yet undreamed of new nuclear advances.

Perhaps in 10 or 20 years, they will perfect an antimatter technology that will make nuclear weapons appear as weak and trivial as bows and arrows are today. No one knows how the offensive nuclear and super nuclear technology will change over the next 25 years before star wars can be fully deployed, but we do know that, absent comprehensive arms control, it will progress, advance probably at breathtaking speed. What the Soviet Union can do in 1986 with their nuclear arsenal to penetrate a star wars fully deployed in 2010 will be as nothing compared to what the Soviet Union of 2010 will be able to use to challenge star wars.

What does that mean? It means that star wars will be pathetically feeble and useless unless we constantly modernize it. We will have to continually modify and change our battle stations and satellites and other deployments to have any chance against the predictable improvement of the Soviet nuclear offense.

Will that be costly? Consider: It will mean continued billions of dollars poured into star wars research every year. It will require a huge cost to produce the new and constantly changing star wars technology. The battle stations and satellites we deploy in 2010 may swiftly become obsolete and useless. All the beautiful and bright new star wars technology of the 1980's and 1990's will swiftly become horse-and-buggy stuff. We will have to lift off into space what is likely to be a much heavier, vaster array of space defenders.

What will the cost of the new hardware be? Will it be even greater than the original star wars? Almost certainly. Will its transportation into space cost more? Very likely. Will its maintenance cost more? Very likely. Will its modernization cost more? Almost certainly.

Mr. President, if Congress continues to insist on pursuing star wars, this ghost of invulnerability, by relying on military technology instead of arms control as our salvation, we will never achieve that invulnerability. Ah, but one end we will achieve for sure: A huge Federal Government burden of debt and taxes that will eventually choke off even our marvelous economy.

MYTH OF THE DAY: WORLD COURT RESERVATION IMPROVES AMERICAN SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the myth of the day is that the World Court reservation to the Genocide Convention will strengthen America's position in ratifying this treaty.

Nothing could be further from the truth.

In many ways it is the ultimate irony of a debate heavy on the evils of Communist despots that those decrying these evils would tie America's hands behind our back in attempting to bring these despots before the bar of justice.

Of course, the reservation was presented as a way of protecting America from the evils of international bullies who might attempt to embarrass and intimidate us with propaganda charges of genocide.

Unfortunately, they were not willing to look at the brave and courageous example of Israel. If ever a state has suffered from political intimidation and harassment it is the State of Israel; yet they have been a party to the Genocide Convention for over three decades without such a cowardly reservation.

Has any such propaganda charge been raised by the enemies of Israel in the World Court? No. Not once.

Is America to act more defensively and timidly than Israel? This reservation puts us in that position.

Curiously, there was a time when the United States stood for the exposure to international scrutiny, a sharp and compelling contrast to the fear of such scrutiny by Communist and totalitarian regimes. A contrast that we should maintain, not blur.

After all, what do we have to fear from the World Court?

Some opponents of the Genocide Convention tried to confuse the American public by implying that the Court hears cases between individuals. That is simply untrue. The Court only hears cases between nations.

And what has been our track record before the Court? Until the Nicaragua case, the United States had prevailed repeatedly before the Court; in fact, we won the Iranian hostage case unanimously. I wonder how we did that if the Court is such a hostile place.

But the reason not to fear decisions by the Court does not rest in past history, the nature of the judges or pie-in-the-sky support for international law. The reason we need not fear the Court is far more concrete. The Court has no enforcement authority for its decisions except to appeal to the U.N.

Security Council, where we possess a permanent veto. Thus, the Court can never enforce an order against us if we choose to exercise our veto.

The saddest aspect of this reservation is that any time that the United States attempts to take a future Pol Pot, Idi Amin, or similar despot before the World Court, we will not be able to do it. Under the "doctrine of reciprocity," which the architects of this reservation knew all too well, they can invoke our reservation against us.

And while the Soviets and other Communist nations have such a cowardly reservation as well, our adoption of a reservation like this lets them off the hook scot-free. We will put them in a position where they can simply argue that we have no legal basis to ask them to go to the Court to defend their actions in Afghanistan.

Why should we do that? If we feel they are violating this treaty, we should force them to invoke their own reservation and embarrass them repeatedly at it. We should not hand them an American reservation as a legal way out of their dilemma. It simply makes no sense.

Billed as one part of a so-called "sovereignty package," it is difficult to see how this reservation protects anyone but the Communist and totalitarian despots who are committing genocide and will do so again in the future. We should untie the bonds of this reservation and come out fighting with all of our diplomatic and political and economic clout to stop them.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized.

SENATOR HAWKINS' SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, we all know my colleague and very good friend, Senator PAULA HAWKINS, is unable to be with us at this time. We also all know that she is certainly the leader in fighting drugs in this Nation and around the world by the work and time she has put into it. Had she been here today, she would have made for the RECORD a statement that I am going to read for her at this time.

TERRORISTS AND DRUG SMUGGLERS TAKE NOTE: WE'VE HAD ENOUGH

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, as any person who watches television, listens to radio, or reads newspapers must know by this time, our war of words with Libyan strongman, Muammar Qadhafi, has escalated to something considerably stronger than that. President Reagan has told Americans that the U.S. has irrefutable evidence that Libya was responsible for the recent terrorist bombing of a West Berlin discotheque. One American serviceman was killed and 50 injured in the blast. A Turkish woman was also killed, and 180 persons of various nationalities were injured. Despite the fact that more non-Americans were victims of the explosion than Americans, there is little doubt that American citizens, particularly our off-duty military personnel, were the primary targets of the terrorists. Our intelligence network intercepted messages indicating that an attack would take place in West Berlin on the date involved, April 5, but was unable to pinpoint the exact location of the expected assault. Tragically, as luck would have it, we did receive information about where the bomb might explode, but only minutes before the explosion took place, and there was not enough time to flash a warning.

Qadhafi's brand of terrorism is financed by oil money. Libya is blessed with large quantities of high grade oil, widely sought after on the world market. Qadhafi has been called the Lloyds of London of terrorism. Libya exports terrorism, and terrorism has many tentacles. It is just a hop and skip between terrorism and narcotics trafficking, and down the road lie arms smuggling and subversion. Michael Ledeen, of the Georgetown Center for Strategic and International Studies, a recognized expert on terrorism, once observed: "Running drugs is one sure way to make big money in a hurry. Moreover, the directions of the flow are ideologically attractive. Drugs go to the bourgeois countries, where they corrupt and where they kill, while the arms go to pro-Communist terrorist groups in the Third World."

Americans have learned, in recent months, that terrorism is not something that happens over there to someone else. It is happening to us; Americans are the primary target of terrorist attacks. In 1982, terrorist activity against the U.S. took a sharp upturn. In that year, there were 385 recorded acts of terror against the U.S., including 7 assassinations, 6 kidnappings, and 160 bombings of U.S.-owned property. There was a firebomb attack against an American soft drink plant in Colombia, and an attempted bombing of the U.S. Embassy in the Dominican Republic.

In 1983, the upward trend continued with 500 terrorist attacks worldwide, with Americans being the direct target of 200. Then, in April, there was the bombing of our Embassy in Beirut, in which 49 people died, and in October the horrifying incident where a suicide squad of terrorists rammed through the gates of the Marine compound at Beirut Airport and killed more than 200 American servicemen as they slept. Numerous random terrorist attacks have occurred since that tragic event, capped by the West Berlin bombing earlier this month.

One could fall into the trap of saying these are isolated, individual acts, largely unplanned. But the fact of the matter is, they are meticulously planned, carefully orchestrated, and well-financed. The finances spew from a variety of sources—national governments, organizations, and individuals motivated by a sense of mistaken righteousness, lust for power, or thirst for what they perceive as revenge. Narcotics trafficking swirls around and around inside the vortex of terrorism. Drugs are a ready source of hard cash. A drug network can be used to channel weapons into the hands of terrorists and troublemaking insurgent groups. The end result is corruption in high and low places, economic instability, and wrecked health from the drug traffic and social turbulence, personal horror and suffering from terrorism.

President Reagan has served notice on Qadhafi that terrorism against America and Americans is not going to be tolerated. I hope that in the coming months we send just as clear a signal to the drug runners that narcotics trafficking is just as unacceptable.

WE WILL ALWAYS REMEMBER SALLY HEET

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, our Senate office deeply mourns today. Yesterday in a mindless act of violence, my press secretary, Sally Heet, was brutally murdered. We all feel that something precious has been stolen from our lives. Sally was one of the first staff members I hired after being appointed as U.S. Senator. Immediately before that she had served as vice president for Corporate Communications at Rainier Bank in Seattle. She played a crucial role in establishing our transition office, and I was delighted when she agreed to become my press secretary.

During the past 3 years she has built a broad circle of friends and has earned the growing respect of the political press corps. She was a self-possessed, confident professional whose competence gave all of us an unusual opportunity to communicate our actions to the people of our State.

Far more than that, Sally was an integral part of the closely knit family of our senatorial staff and a personal friend and confidant. We worked together, played together, sang together, and reveled in the demanding and challenging life at Capitol Hill.

Life is made up largely of memories. Some are vague; some can be recalled in vivid detail; some guide us in our future actions; and some act as inspiration for our own lives.

Someone has taken Sally's physical presence from us but no one can steal our memories of her. I know her friends and colleagues will be comforted by their memories of shared experiences. Sally in that way will remain with us, still giving inspiration, advice and a happy chuckle over a funny incident.

Today is not a farewell but a celebration of a short but rich life. We know Sally continues to live for us through our respect, our love, and our memories.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 12 noon with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

COMBINED FEDERAL CAMPAIGN PARTICIPATION

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, recently the Washington Post editorialized on the need for proper regulations governing charitable fund drives. Specifically, the editorial pointed out the desirability of establishing regulations on the kinds of organizations eligible to participate in the organized charitable collection effort among Federal employees through the Combined Federal Campaign. I applaud the editorial and this administration in their efforts to try to bring some common sense and fairness to the most important fundraising effort for a majority of this Nation's health and welfare charitable groups.

The comments contained in the editorial bear close attention and I recommend that all my friends read it closely. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to enclose at the end of my remarks the complete text of the April 14 editorial printed in the Washington Post entitled "Charities, Lobbies, and the CFC."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 14, 1986]

CHARITIES, LOBBIES AND THE CFC

After years of litigation and plenty of acrimony, the Office of Personnel Management has now issued final regulations concerning the federal government's charity fund drive. The Combined Federal Campaign, begun 25 years ago to regularize charitable collections in federal work places, now raises well over $100 million a year. Every federal installation, civil and military, all over the world is involved, and the government subsidizes the effort with personnel, publicity, paper work and payroll deductions.

Traditionally, the beneficiaries of the drive were charitable organizations working in health and welfare areas. But in 1980, advocacy groups—lobbyists and litigators who were nonprofit and tax exempt—were added to the list of participants. That's when the trouble started, for the people who would be happy to give to the Puerto Rican Legal Defense Fund and the Sierra Club, for example, were not as pleased to share the pot with the National Right to Work folks and the NRA's offshoot, the Firearms Civil Rights Legal Defense Fund. The feeling, of course, was mutual. By 1983, unions with more than a third of a million members were boycotting the drive and employee participation had fallen from 70.6 percent to 54.5 percent. President Reagan issued an executive order that year directing OPM to limit participation to health and welfare groups, and that order was contested until the Supreme Court upheld it last July.

The new regulations, which go into effect next month, are fair and make sense. Federal employees, like all citizens, retain the right to contribute to whatever charity they choose, and many excellent advocacy groups deserve their support. The government, however, will only subsidize solicitation and collection at the office or duty station for those charities providing direct assistance to the needy in this country and abroad. Such assistance includes health care and research, aid to the handicapped, rehabilitation services to delinquents, released convicts and addicts, services to victims of crime and abuse, famine and disaster relief, legal aid to the poor and general relief to children, the elderly and those in need. No organization that spends over 15 percent of its funds on lobbying or litigation can participate.

The regulations treat all organizations objectively whether they advocate liberal or conservative causes. They should put an end to resentment over the distribution of funds to controversial groups and benefit those organizations whose work directly benefits the sick, the poor and other afflicted persons. That is what the charity fund drive should be about.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS

A message from the President of the United States announced that he had approved and signed the following joint resolutions:

On April 9, 1986:

S.J. Res. 52, Joint resolution to designate the month of April 1986 as "National School Library Month".

On April 17, 1986:

S.J. Res. 261, Joint resolution to designate the week of April 14, 1986 through April 20, 1986, as "National Mathematics Awareness Week".

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 11:03 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following joint resolutions, each with amendments, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

S.J. Res. 214. Joint resolution to provide for the reappointment of Carlisle H. Humelsine as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; and

S.J. Res. 215. Joint resolution to provide for the reappointment of William G. Bowen as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

At 12:14 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled joint resolutions:

S.J. Res. 303. Joint resolution to designate April 1986, as "Fair Housing Month";

H.J. Res. 582. Joint resolution to designate April 20, 1986, as "Education Day U.S.A."; and

H.J. Res. 599. Joint resolution commemorating the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Bay of Pigs invasion to liberate Cuba from Communist tyranny.

The enrolled joint resolutions were subsequently signed by the Acting President pro tempore (Mr. STEVENS).

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. DOLE (for Mr. THURMOND):

S. 2338. A bill to amend the Tariff Schedules of the United States to reclassify extracorporeal shock wave lithotripters; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. BYRD, Mr. WILSON and Mr. GRAMM):

S. 2339. A bill to provide for the appointment of Serrandito Ribas-Dominicci and Peter Lorence to the service academy of their choice at the time that they satisfy the requirements for admission to such academy; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. STAFFORD (for himself, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. MOYNIHAN and Mr. HUMPHREY):

S. 2340. A bill entitled the "Oil Pollution Liability and Compensation Act of 1986"; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. DOLE (for Mr. THURMOND)

S. 2338. A bill to amend the tariff schedules of the United States to reclassify extracorporeal shock wave lithotripters; to the Committee on Finance.

RECLASSIFICATION OF EXTRACORPOREAL SHOCK WAVE LITHOTRIPTERS

● Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to remedy an existing inequity in the tariff schedules of the United States [TSUS] concerning the classsification of extracorporeal shock wave lithotripters.

The extracorporeal shock wave lithotripter is a new invention which generates a shock wave to disintegrate kidney stones without invasive surgery. At present, the only lithotripter manufacturer which has received Food and Drug Administration approval for use in the United States is Dornier Medical Systems, Inc., which is based in West Germany. There are no domestic manufacturers presently producing a lithotripter approved by our Government.

The lithotripter enables patients to avoid surgery and thus relieves pain and suffering, reduces the cost of kidney stone treatment, significantly reduces the length of the hospital stay and reduces the recuperation time dramatically. Many lithotripter procedures are performed on an out-patient basis, compared to the major surgery often associated with kidney stone removal.

There are really only two practical areas under the tariff schedule to place new devices like the lithotripter. These two choices would fall under the category of electro-medical apparatus, and parts thereof:

(A) Electro-surgical apparatus, and parts there of (9.2 percent duty);

(B) Other (4 percent duty).

The tariff duty with respect to "electro-surgical apparatus, and parts thereof" is approximately twice as high as that for "other." At present, the differences between the two categories when applied to the present price of the lithotripter is approximately $100,000. Thus, whether the procedure is "surgical" or "nonsurgical" is crucial.

In 1983, the Customs Service made a determination that the lithotripter should be treated as a surgical apparatus. The decision is surprising since, in fact, no surgery is actually performed with the lithotripter. Indeed, the whole utility of the machine lies in the fact that its use avoids invasion of the body or other surgical techniques. By contrast the Customs Service reasoned that a surgical device is one used by surgeons. Since urologists are surgeons, and since urologists are expected to operate these machines, the Customs Service ruled that the device was a surgical device.

This decision seems to contradict an equally important decision taken by another Federal agency on the same question.

For purposes of Medicare reimbursement, the Federal Government assigns diagnostic related groups [DRG] classifications to each surgical procedure and pays accordingly. The choice for most lithotripter applications is either medical treatment of kidney stones (DRG 324) or surgical treatment of kidney stones (DRG 305).

Presently, Medicare is reimbursing the lithotripter treatment under the medical treatment DRG and not the surgical DRG. The reimbursement is substantially lower than if the surgical DRG was used.

Thus, the Federal Government determines that this is a surgical procedure for customs purposes, and a medical procedure for reimbursement purposes. These inconsistent determinations are neither logical nor fair and make the lithotripter providers financially the least favorable. This is inconsistent with good government policy.

Mr. President, my bill would correct this inequity by reclassifying lithotripters entered, or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, on or after April 30, 1986 at the 4.4 percent duty rate. A companion bill, H.R. 4533, has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Representative RICHARD A. GEPHARDT, and my colleague from South Carolina, CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

I strongly encourage my colleagues to favorably support this bill and help patients avoid surgery by making these machines available to them at reasonable costs.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2338

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. EXTRACORPOREAL SHOCK WAVE LITHOTRIPTERS.

Item 709.15 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States is amended by inserting "(other than extracorporeal shock wave lithotripters)" after "Electro-surgical apparatus".

SEC. 2. EFFECTIVE DATE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The amendment made by this Act shall apply with respect to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption after the date that is 15 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) RELIQUIDATION.—Notwithstanding section 514 of the Tariff Act of 1930 or any other provision of law, upon a request filed with the appropriate customs officer before the date that is 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, any entry of extracorporeal shock wave lithotripters that was made—

(1) after April 30, 1986, and

(2) on or before the date that is 15 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

shall be liquidated or reliquidated as though such entry occurred on the day after the date that is 15 days after the date of enactment of this Act.●

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. BYRD, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. GRAMM):

S. 2339. A bill to provide for the appointment of Serrnandito Ribas-Dominicci and Peter Lorence to the service academy of their choice at the time that they satisfy the requirements for admission to such academy; to the Committee on Armed Services.

APPOINTMENT TO SERVICE ACADEMY OF THEIR CHOICE FOR SERRNANDITO RIBAS-DOMINICCI AND PETER LORENCE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce a bill which provides for the appointment of Serrnandito Ribas-Dominicci and Peter Lorence to the service academy of their choice when they come of age.

Serrnandito Ribas-Dominicci is the 4-year-old son of Capt. Fernando Ribas-Dominicci, the pilot whose plane did not return from the U.S. military action taken over Libya. When President Reagan called Fernando's widow, Blanca, to extend his condolences, he asked her whether there was anything the country could do to help repay the enormous debt we own her husband for the ultimate sacrifice he made for our self-defense. She asked for only one thing: That the captain's son be assured an appointment at the Air Force Military Academy when he grows up, for he had already decided that, like his father, he wanted to be a pilot.

Peter Lorence is the 8-month-old son of Capt. Paul F. Lorence, who was the bombardier and navigator on Captain Ribas-Dominicci's plane. Captain Lorence enlisted in the Air Force when he graduated from high school and was well known for his passion for flying, a trait he inherited from his maternal grandfather who was a pilot in Britain's Royal Flying Corps during World War I. This bill will also secure an academy appointment for young Peter, should he decide as he gets older to follow in his family's proud military tradition.

In 1941, President Roosevelt led an effort to secure a military academy appointment for the infant son of Colin P. Kelly, who was the first military pilot to be killed in action in World War II. Republicans don't often quote FDR, but his eloquent letter "To the President of the United States in 1956" in young Colin's behalf I think bears repeating now. Specifically, he said:

I am writing this letter as an act of faith in the destiny of our country. I desire to make a request which I make in full confidence that we shall achieve a glorious victory in the war we now are waging to preserve our democratic way of life.

My request is that you consider the merits of a young American youth of goodly heritage—Colin P. Kelly III—for appointment as a cadet in the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. I make this appeal in behalf of this youth as a token of the Nation's appreciation of the herioc services of his father, who met death in the line of duty at the very outset of the struggle which was thrust upon us by the perfidy of a professed friend.

In the conviction that the service and example of Capt. Colin P. Kelly, Jr., will be long remembered, I ask for this consideration in behalf of Colin P. Kelly III.

Mr. President, Serrnandito and Peter are innocent victims; fatherless because our country was forced to respond to a crazed petty dictator in a far away country who could not resist tormenting this country and other nations with violence, threatened and real. Hopefully, by the time these two boys come of age, the nightmare of terrorism will be no more. But history has taught that violence and aggression cannot be overcome by looking the other way; it must be met head on. Their fathers met the challenge, giving their lives for our peace and safety. For that, this legislation is truly, as FDR said, a mere token of our appreciation.

Mr. President, by proposing this legislation, I do not mean to set a precedent whereby legislation to set aside appointments to military academies would become common place. But this is an extraordinary situation which merits extraordinary legislation—the morally required response to a mother's unique request. To view it otherwise would denigrate its meaning and importance.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2339

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is requested to appoint Serrnandito Ribas-Dominicci and Peter Lorence to the service academy of their choice at such time as each of them respectively satifies the requirements established for admission to such academy.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 1654

At the request of Mr. STEVENS, the name of the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] was added as a cosponsor of S. 1654, a bill to amend title 18, United States Code, to provide for criminal forfeiture of proceeds derived from espionage activities and rewards for informants providing information leading to arrests in espionage cases.

S. 2134

At the request of Mr. HEFLIN, the name of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] was added as a cosponsor of S. 2134, a bill to amend title 39, United States Code, to extend to certain officers and employees of the Postal Service the same procedural and appeal rights with respect to certain adverse personnel actions as are to Federal employees under title 5, United States Code.

S. 2144

At the request of Mr. NICKLES, the name of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON] was added as a cosponsor of S. 2144, a bill to amend the Farm Credit Act of 1971 to provide credit assistance to certain borrowers of loans by institutions of the Farm Credit System, and for other purposes.

S. 2165

At the request of Mr. GORTON, the name of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] was added as a cosponsor of S. 2165, a bill to authorize States to determine the level of funds allotted to a State under the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Act of 1981 to be available for low-cost residential weatherization and other energy-related home repair projects for low-income households.

S. CON. RES. 122

At the request of Mr. NICKLES, the name of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Conference Resolution 122, a concurrent resolution to express the sense of Congress with respect to agricultural loan restructuring.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEE TO MEET

SUBCOMMITTEE ON STRATEGIC AND THEATER NUCLEAR FORCES

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Strategic and Theater Nuclear Forces, of the Committee on Armed Services, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Friday, April 18, 1986, in open, later to become closed executive session, in order to conduct a hearing on Navy nuclear programs, and Navy reactor programs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

COPYRIGHTS AND THE MUSIC INDUSTRY

● Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, the Wednesday, April 9, 1986, edition of the Washington Times contained an article featuring artist Donny Osmond and discussing Senate bill 1980. If passed, S. 1980 would change the way in which music creators and local television stations negotiate payment under copyright law. I ask that this article be included in the RECORD, for I consider it an excellent account of S. 1980, as told from the artist's perspective.

The article follows:

DONNY JOINS SONGWRITER HILL RALLY

(By Lou Fournier)

Donny Osmond is your basic optimist, sure his career is really just getting off the ground. But the pop star, late of Utah and teen godhood, now living in Southern California, sees a dark threat facing American creativity, and he's here to do something about it.

"When I heard about the whole issue," he says, "I said, 'Yo, babe! I gotta get involved with this!' "

"The whole issue" "is a bill pending in Congress that has most major songwriters in the country hopping-mad. The bill, brainchild of pennywatching broadcasters, would set compensation for composers of music written for broadcast media at a high, single, flat-rate, one-time fee, rather than paying royalty residuals over long periods of time.

"This is not even a legal issue," Mr. Osmond says, echoing similar sentiments of composer Paul Williams and country writer/performer T.G. Shephard, milling in a room at the Madison Hotel with Mr. Osmond. "This is a moral issue. The thing is, in the long run it would even hurt the producers who are trying to save money with it."

"I'm here because music is essentially property," Mr. Williams says. "When I write a piece of music, it's mine to sell, lease or rent as I choose. This bill is an attempt by the government to assume those rights for itself. It's grossly unfair and morally wrong for the government to tell us how to do our business. This would be a very dangerous precedent if it passed."

"This is wrong," Mr. Shephard agrees. "There's always some greed where money is concerned, and this bill is just trying to save some broadcasters some long-range money. What they don't see is how it'll hurt us all. It'll kill off a lot of creativity."

"The bill would make the one-time fee so expensive," Mr. Osmond says, "that producers would eventually end up having to use public-domain music, or even foreign music. That would hurt their own product. But it would mostly hurt the American songwriter; he's going to have no incentive to write anymore. And I believe that the greatest American product is music.

"I'm an established artist, and I can still make a living. But new artists would have a very tough time if this bill goes through. I'm working with a guy now who's a real genius, he just writes incredible stuff. But I don't know if he could make it if this bill were law."

Mr. Osmond offers a stark illustration of what he sees as another danger of the bill, that of assigning a monetary value to a musical composition that would be far below its true artistic worth. "Imagine," he says, "if Irving Berlin had only been paid once for 'White Christmas.'

"I actually worry about the broadcasters who want this bill. They don't see the long-range situation here; they don't realize this would actually hurt them. They have to realize that it's the artists who keep them in business."

Mr. Osmond is part of a high-visibility team of musicians which spent yesterday going door-to-door through the congressional office buildings trying to convince legislators of the folly of the bill. Other artists included Mr. Williams, Mr. Shephard, Mike Post, Marilyn Bergman, Wayland Holyfield, Richard Leigh and Peter McCaan.

This morning the group will hold a press conference to voice further opposition before a scheduled 9:30 a.m. hearing on the bill by the Senate Subcommittee on Patents, Copyrights and Trademarks. This morning's conference will feature appearances via specially made videos by Quincy Jones, Henry Mancini, Dolly Parton, Lionel Richie, Smoky Robinson, and Stevie Wonder. Two performance-rights organizations, the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers (ASCAP) and Broadcast Music Inc. (BMI), were also involved in the lobbying effort.

Mr. Osmond is chiefly remembered for his popular TV series with his sister, "The Donny and Marie Show," and a series of wildly successful, youth-oriented recordings by the pair.

Last year he took his own production company public, moved with his wife and three children out of Utah, where he had maintained strong ties with the Mormon community, changed his management company and started recording a new album.

"Everybody wants to be a legend," Mr. Osmond says, when asked how he would like to be remembered in, say, another 50 years. "Certainly I've made a dent in the music industry; that's my dream. My best music is yet to be realized."●

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I will not move to proceed to the drug export bill, and file cloture on the motion to proceed. I just had a discussion with the distinguished Senator from Ohio, Senator METZENBAUM. He has indicated that he has no objection to going to the bill. He will have a number of amendments, and extensive debate on the bill itself if we bring it up after we dispose of the budget resolution.

On that basis, I see no reason to move to that and file cloture, if we do not need do it. It will take some time to be on the bill itself.

I guess with that understanding when we dispose of the budget resolution, at least as far as Senator METZENBAUM is concerned—somebody else might object—there will be no objection to proceeding to S. 1848. It may not come up right after the budget resolution. It may come up later. But that is no problem to Senator METZENBAUM; if it never comes up, it will be soon enough as I understand it.

So I guess we will be able to leave here fairly quickly. Let me check a couple of those items.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORTON). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be recinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The majority leader is recognized.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes on Monday, April 21, 1986, the reading of the Journal be dispensed with; that no resolution come over under the rule; that the call of the Calendar be dispensed with; that following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there be special orders in favor of Senators HAWKINS, PROXMIRE, and CRANSTON for not to exceed 5 minutes each, to be followed by a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond 1 p.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each; provided, further, that the morning hour be deemed to have expired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY, APRIL 21, 1986

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in adjournment until 12 noon on Monday, April 21, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS ON MONDAY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there be a special order in favor of Senators HAWKINS, PROXMIRE, and CRANSTON for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON MONDAY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, following the special orders just identified, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond 1 p.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I indicated earlier that there might be a possibility on Monday of calling up S. 49, the gun control bill. I am advised by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. MCCLURE], who is the manager of that bill, that he would prefer not to try to do that on Monday; but he is working with Members who have some questions about the bill, and maybe they can work it out later in the week.

There is still a possibility of bringing up the budget resolution on Monday.

I have also indicated that we might move to proceed to the drug export bill, S. 1848. But I have had a discussion with the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM], and he indicates that he would be willing to let that bill come up after we dispose of the budget resolution, without going through cloture on the motion to proceed.

It is my hope that we can clear the nomination of Donald Newman, and I indicate for the RECORD that there is no objection on the Democratic side. The objection is coming from this side, the Republican side. I hope that Senator HUMPHREY and Senator HELMS will be able on Monday to let us dispose of that nomination. It is a very important nomination.

It is also my hope that on Monday we can take care of this little concurrent resolution that has been floating around for a couple of weeks. There are 38 cosponsors. In effect, it is a sense of the Senate to indicate that the Farm Credit System should use certain practices to protect American farmers. We believe it is important. We obviously have faith in the regulatory agency, but we believe that by passing this legislation it would underscore the concern Congress has when we are dealing with farmers and credit policies that affect farmers. So I hope that on Monday, without a record vote, we might be able to pass that.

Mr. President, I indicate for the RECORD that there will be no votes on Monday, as was announced previously. We will do our best to protect some of our colleagues on Wednesday, which is the beginning of Passover, with no votes after a certain hour that afternoon—4 o'clock or 6 o'clock. We will work that out to their satisfaction.

I indicate that there could be late nights on other days, particularly if we get into the budget, because it is a 50-hour process; and I assume that unless there is some agreement to reduce the time, we would need to stay in late, at least to run the clock.

Friday session next week? Again I am not in position to say there will not be one. I guess I just assume that there would be a Friday session next week with votes but if something develops between now and hopefully Tuesday when we have our policy luncheons I will convey that to the distinguished leaders.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, APRIL 21, 1986

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move that the Senate stand in adjournment until the hour of 12 noon, Monday, April 21, 1986.

The motion was agreed to, and, at 12:54 p.m., the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 21, 1986, at 12 noon.
